day was animated with this same mocking humour. His songs are wittily sarcastic, but also invested with personal perspectives and emotion. I was repeatedly impressed at how Wiseman's complex lyrics could be so immediately accessible.

Between each song, Wiseman spun chatty monologues about most anything: finding a kitten, "knocking back brewskis with Jean Charest," or trying to convince his relatives to let him in on the Jewish conspiracy he keeps hearing about. Wiseman even gave downtown eatery The Sunflower a three-word review ("the greatest restaurant!").

Wiseman is a remarkable musician. His voice is sometimes teasingly tentative, but it grows rich as his songs progress. Although Wiseman was alone on stage, he seemed able to coax other instruments from his guitar. In "Bhopal," I could have sworn that he was knocking himself up.

Wiseman's taste for the experimental surfaced early in the evening when he created a wider effect by swaying to either side of his microphone. Later on, he turned his guitar to the ceiling, using it for percussion while continuing to play. As the song neared its end, Wiseman drifted into characteristic randomness. As a friend of mine said, referring to Wiseman's old band, "this ain't no Blue Rodeo."

No stranger to the experimental, Meryn Cadell drew enthusiastic applause for "I Been Redeemed," a duet she performed with a little red tape recorder playing her own voice.

Cadell is a quirky, extraordinary performer whose song-poems are best live. Much of her set was undiluted poetry, spoken rhythmically but without musical accompaniment. When Cadell did want musical backing, it was provided by a friendly-looking guitar-bass-drum band that featured Martin Tjelli of the Rheostatics. In the background for most of the night, these performers came alive for "Steam Clean Express," a pulsing song that had Cadell disguise herself as intelligence to the next," as the harpsichordist Hank Knox previewed it. The flute in the Adagio was buoyed by the gentle support from the other three instruments in an atmosphere of impenetrable and undeniable grace, leading into two pastoral Arias.

The closing selection was Leclair's 1737 Deuxième récréation de musique, a work that L'ensemble Arion performed exquisitely, handling the range from serene floating to scampering sixteenth-notes with finesse. The centre suite, especially the intertwining variations in the penultimate Chaconne, was a rhythmically-demanding ensemble work, but the nonverbal communication among the players was exceptionally successful and a pleasure to witness.

The entire performance was a harvest of graciousness and peaceful concordance. The style was relievingly free of annoying flourishes that often appear in later music. The musicians treated the ends of phrases with saintly sensitivity, and the seemingly effortless technique of each player combined to create an ensemble that well suits the bubbles of praise that trail this group. In the deft words of The Boston Herald, the members of L'ensemble Arion "stop worrying about the fact that they're playing period music and simply start playing music, period."

From the expressive stroking of the seven-stringed viola da gamba to the dulcet breaths of the flute, Montréal-based L'ensemble Arion coloured the Thanksgiving of the small but appreciative audience on Sunday. As the first of Queen's Performing Arts' "Music for a Sunday Afternoon" series, this concert bodes well for the quality of concerts yet to come.

merely a lead vocalist. Nevertheless, she was still careful to enunciate the best lines of the song: if everyone else jumped off a cliff would you drive down to the bottom in your Jeep! and go through everyone else's wallets just to see if there was anything worth keeping?

Although Cadell's first charm is her humour, she has a beautiful voice that went unrecognized on the releases from her first album Angel Food for Thought. In concert, Cadell ensured that no-one would be unaware of her talent. "Bark on the Tree", a song about passing by an old lover's house, was exquisite.

My favourite piece of the night was a long monologue called "Home Ec". I had never heard it before, so the piece had the same freshness that must make it thrilling to be a new Cadell fan. Cadell did not include "Home Ec" on her new album Bombazine, because - like her hit "The Sweater" - it is a song about her school years. "Some people think I only write about high school," Cadell said. "That's what a single will get ya."

When the time came for "The Sweater", Cadell camped it up. She swung herself melodramatically around the stage, and even recited part of the song in a Valley girl accent.

Cadell was called back for a second encore ("Weenie Man"), and I could have called her back for a dozen more. Her performance was energetic and fun, and it made for a wonderful night.

Thursday's concert was co-sponsored by the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Issues Committee. Together, Wiseman and Cadell's songs touched on the problems of sexism, rape, bashing, anti-Semitism, corporate greed, historical revisionism, powerlessness and more. The last song in Wiseman's set warned about the pervasiveness of hurt: arson is the norm in this city of wood. And yet, the audience laughed and cheered all night. This was neither escapism nor insensitivity, but a refusal to be cowed by the arsonists of the world.

Shag Tape Contest Winners Get Involved in Threesome!

Before we begin, loyal readers, let's make a quick confession: the Shag Tape Contest was really a creative writing contest in disguise!

Regular readers will note that The Journal does have an annual creative writing contest, but those things are geared towards people who someday intend to write books that will end up on coffee table or incomprehensible Literary Lapses poesy that goes something like:

Last tequila shot,
I trip on a power cord
Sound of me weeping.

(Haiku. Brrr.)

We pored over all the entries (all seven of them, you lazy slackjaws), and awarded points for what we felt was creative inspiration, erotically charged or just damn funny. At the end of the judging session, which took three hours, many recreational chemicals and a llama, the top three entries had identical scores. Rather than come up with some kind of tiebreaker, we at MISC decided to be generous and declare a three-way tie. It also gave us an excuse to come up with a titillating headline for this story. The people or groups who submitted the winning entries can drop by the Journal House any time and claim their two free personals. There are still the matter of the bottle of Tabasco sauce; we have only one to give away. We decided to give it to winner number one, for reasons that will soon be obvious.

Winner 1: Tim M.

- 1. Fucking in Rhythm and Sorrow by the Sugarabes
Sex as dialectic.
2. Head by Priine
No comment.
3. Must Have Been Drunk by Romanovsky and Phillips
A likely story...
4. Boy Pop by Book of Love
An ode to versatility.
5. Some Kinda Love by the Velvet Underground
Anthem of the polymorphously perverse.
6. In or Out by Ani DiFranco
Bt and double-entred? Excellent...
7. Some Wai'd Sin by Kgy Pop
'til the church-induced guilt wears off...
8. The Slim by Suga
Damn that morbid sex/death correlation!
9. Waiting for the Man by the Velvet Underground
Sob... the story of my life...
10. Sheela-na-gig by Pl Harvey
...wash that man right out of my hair!/take my hips to a man who cares/HEARD IT BEFORE!...nuff said.

The arbiters speak:

This is not so much a shag tape as it is a "sit quietly in your darkened room and wish revenge on a former lover" tape, but it is creative and says so much with so few words (1 point for poetic conciseness). Tim earns 1 point for proper use of a ten-dollar word ("dialectic", i.e. a debate with Mr. Spock), a half-point for mentioning polymorphous perversity, 1 point for an AIDS reference (track 8), 2 points for his bitterness theme and 1 point for the homoeroticism (a nice break from typical hetero swinging-like-God's-own-dick locker room fare). Final score: 6.5.

"Why do you play that tape every time I visit?"

mood like no other song (except maybe War Pigs).
9. Kansas: Dust in the Wind
Nothing sets the mood like a song that says "your life is meaningless". But hey, so's mine so let's do it, baby. This song is so deep it brings tears to my eyes, man.

Winner 2: Kathryn Leo

Imagine if you will a time machine shaped like a Pacer or a Camryn, or maybe a really cool van with thick pile carpeting and an air-brushed painting on the exterior of Neptune, god of the sea. Climb in, we're going back to the Seventies. More than any other decade, the Seventies stand for sex - none of that hippie love business, just serious shagging. AIDS was unheard of and safe sex meant not cracking your head on the window while shagging in the car or not falling into the toilet while boning in the bathroom stall at the disco. So put on your white polyester suit, or your Levis cords and Foghal T-shirt, dim the lights and turn on the 8-track.

1. Afternoon Delight

Why wait until bedtime? I remember when this song was in heavy rotation on AM radio. I thought that it was about a fireworks show - you know, the part about skyrockets in flight. I think that I figured out what it was about around the same time that I realized that the Village People were gay. I think that was last year. (Okay, I'll admit I'm a little naive sometimes).

2. Barry M: Rasputin

Heat things up with something funky, something fast-paced yet suggestive at the same time. Rah rah Rasputin Russia's greatest love machine. Need I say more?

3. Isaac Hayes: Theme from "Shaft"

"Who's the black private dick who's a sex machine to all the chicks? Shaft. Damn right." John Shaft - the guy who women want and men want to be. "Shaft - he's one mean mother-shut yo' mouth - but I'm talkin' 'bout Shaft! Then we can dig it." This works as sort of an appetizer for the Barry White main course.

4. Barry White: Can't Get Enough of Your Love, Baby

Enough of the upbeat stuff - it's time to get down to the matter at hand (uh, yeah). Man, myth, legend, deity, demi-god - yes, Barry's all this and more. He's a monument to the art of shagging, an example to live by. Is it hot in here?

5. Yvonne Elliman: If I Can't Have You

It's hard to pick just one song from the Saturday Night Fever soundtrack. This worked like a charm for the white-suited Seventies super-stud John Travolta and it can work for you, too.

6. Nilsson: Without You

This one's a real tearjerker - better have a box of Kleenex handy (obviously this invites some kind of ribald comment - I wish I could think of one). If you're working with a partner, this is a perfect time for exchanging meaningful glances.

7. 10cc: I'm Not in Love

This one is pretty complex by Seventies pop standards. It has what we clever types identify as an element of irony - or perhaps you'll prefer the mood - setting breathy backing vocals. Makes a nice segue into Dream Weaver.

8. Gary Wright: Dream Weaver

A song so shaggy, it should have been automatically disqualified. Loaded with cool sound effects and cosmic wows, it sets the

7. Romeo and Juliet, Die Straits

Maybe we can take a leaf out of the story-but, seeing as they never actually "died" maybe not.

8. In your eyes, Peter Gabriel

I can't see what's in your eyes-they've been shut the whole time! (boo, hiss)

9. Try, Blue Rodeo

Hey, how can you say you don't like it until you've tried it?

10. Alison, Chris Costello

Oh(!)-is that your name? (blush)

Derek and Joey say:

Kathryn! Kate! Kitty! You did not know that the Village People, the simultaneous high and low point of queer visibility in the 70's were gay? You get a half-point for candor about naivete. Just as ABBA did, Boney M are releasing a greatest hits album next week; Kathryn gets a half-point for predicting their ABBA-like revival. Alas, she actually lost a half-point for selecting the Theme from Shaft. Cliche alert! Both Joey "The Lips" Fagan from The Commitments and Cabbagehead from Kids in the Hall use it. She recovers with the Barry White track - one point for picking the Ambassador of Love. She loses a half-point for picking Dream Weaver (Wayne's World reference) but gets it back for realizing it's crap. Couple that with 5 points for a well conceptualized theme and you have a final score of 6.5!

Winner 3: A gaggle of gals

1. True, Spondau Ballet
Ah Ah Ah Aaaaah Aaaaaaaah!!!-he knows this much is true(!)
2. Running on faith, Eric Clapton
If you could shag half as well as Clapton's guitar-people would pay you to do it live-but it's unlikely that those people would be working for MTV.

3. Wicked game, Chris Knack

He said he didn't want to fall in love-fair enough-but did that stop him from grinding against Helena Christensen

4. I want your sex, (all three versions-yes, even the 12" reissue) George Michael

"Nuff said

5. Unchained Melody, Righteous Brothers

I guess whips, chains et. al. need not apply-a righteous recommendation would have you in the missionary position all night long.

Ovide Mercredi leaning to Liberals, NDP

Native leader evaluates platforms

BY BROCK MARTLAND The Queen's Journal

In an interview with the Queen's Journal, Assembly of First Nations leader Ovide Mercredi revealed that he prefers the Liberal and New Democratic parties in the federal election.

"In our assessment there are two parties that have a very progressive platform when it comes to aboriginal matters, that's the Liberal Party and the NDP," Mercredi said.

While as national chief he "can't endorse a party," Mercredi said the AFN has "analyzed [and] assessed" the platforms that are available to us.

Mercredi breezed through the Queen's campus Thursday, promoting his new book, In the Rapids. Navigating the Future of First Nations, co-authored with Mary Ellen Turpel. He spoke to The Journal and appeared on CFRC's Little Radio with Gary Farmer.

"We have a strategy to try to use the election as an opportunity to profile the native issues again, because they've been declining in public awareness," Mercredi said.

He believes the Liberal and NDP "platforms would address some of the issues that we want to deal with, like the implementation of the right of self-government, and addressing housing and education needs, in dealing with the problems in our communities through economic measures [and] establishing an independent commission to deal with land negotiations."

When asked how he feels about the Liberals' lead in polls, Mercredi dismissed, "if the Liberals form the government, the new prime minister can expect to see me very soon after the election, because I'll be here to hold account, I'll be there backing those reforms that they've promised."

Surface sinks

BY LORI THORLAKSON The Queen's Journal

Arts and Science students have delivered a mandate to discontinue funding Surface, as 55.6 per cent voted against the paper in the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society referendum last week.

With more than 30 per cent of eligible students voting, the referendum had a higher voter turnout than last year's election for the ASUS executive.

"We're disappointed," said Surface Editor Junipero Lagtapon, "but we tried hard, we did the best that we can."

David Anderson, Surface production manager, said "we tried to get our message across, that our mandate is to provide a forum for marginalized forms of expression on the campus."

Andrew Dick, leader of the No campaign, called the referendum outcome a great victory. "Students have had the chance to speak in the most democratic way possible. They have said that they don't want to continue mandatory funding of Surface," he said.

ASUS President Jenn Steeves told The Journal, "I really believe in the paper. I feel it is much different this year than in the past."

Steeves added that she did not think the vote reflected changes in this year's issues of the paper. "But the decision has been made," she said.

Steeves will support the students' decision. "I'm in a very difficult position. I ran on a platform of supporting the paper, I also ran on a platform of being accountable to students," she said.

The referendum is not binding unless motions to nullify current funding provisions, and strike Surface from the ASUS constitution, are carried at a Special General Meeting to be held in lower Victoria Hall on Nov. 4.

Student sexually assaulted

BY BRAD ELDER The Queen's Journal

Last Saturday night, a female Queen's student was sexually assaulted in an alley between King Street East and the Toucan Pub.

Laura McKay said she left her home alone shortly after 11 p.m. and was headed to the Toucan to meet her friends.

As she walked along King Street, she said, she saw four males emerge from the alley which runs between the street and the Toucan. She described three of the males as "visibly drunk," and noted that the fourth was likely not with them, as he pushed passed them on the sidewalk.

As the threesome approached her, McKay said, they were "vocal and insulting."

"I was thinking, 'where's my escape route?'" said McKay, but as she passed them, "they swung around and circled me ... and pinned me to the wall."

Though the street was empty, "the shorter one said 'Let's take her around the corner,'" McKay recounted. She was then pushed into the shadows and pinned against the wall by two males while the third male molested her.

She said that for five minutes she was "touched very intimately ... they were five of the longest minutes of my life."

McKay said that her struggles eventually allowed her to free her leg to kick the middle attacker in the shin and to punch and elbow the attacker to her right.

At this point, she said, she broke free from the males and ran straight to the Toucan.

McKay said that she left the bar with a group of people at about 12:30 a.m. and returned home to tell her two male housemates about the attack. At 1:30 a.m., McKay went to the police.

McKay was not surprised that the fourth male, who she said likely heard the verbal assault, did not assist her. "Women are verbally harassed so much in Kingston streets," she said, that it's as common as "watching a light turn from red to green."

McKay strongly believes that her attackers were Queen's students. "They looked like someone you would see in your class," she said.

In a letter to The Journal, which appears in the Opinions section of this issue, McKay described her attackers.

She said the first assailant was about 6'1, with a slim build, dark straight hair and dark eyes, wearing jeans, a white t-shirt, a Patagonia-type shelled bomber jacket and a blue baseball cap.

The second was about 5'9, with a stocky build and sandy-brown hair, and wearing a neutral sweater, dark cotton pants and white running shoes, she said.

The third she described as 5'11, with medium brown hair, a larger nose, Geronimo-styled shoes, jeans, a dark sweater and an oiled-type barn jacket with a leather collar.

"I could recognize them if I saw them," she said.

Staff Sergeant Bill Doxtator of the Kingston City Police told The Journal that the attack is under investigation, and that anyone with information should phone the police at 549-4660 or Crimestoppers at 634-2293.

McKay, who is the media and correspondence coordinator at the Women's Centre, called upon Queen's administration to "raise the level of consciousness" and to "help [fund] centres that can help women."

City wants special zoning for students

BY MICHAEL MOSS
The Queen's Journal

The City of Kingston's proposals for greater zoning control over the student housing area have student government and university administration alarmed.

The municipal government's plans are detailed in a report, entitled Phase II, that deals with amendments to the City's Official Plan, Zoning Bylaw and Site Control Bylaw. If implemented, the proposed changes would allow the City to specifically zone houses for student habitation.

The report has provoked serious opposition from the Alma Mater Society, the Graduate Student Society, and Student Area Neighbourhood Development (STAND). Although the City claims that its objective is "to provide affordable, safe, sanitary and sound accommodation for all segments of the City's population," the Phase II article of 1992 poses a stumbling block for student-city council relations.

Kingston's Official Plan specifically targets the high density housing area of Queen's as an area of concern. Students represent approximately one quarter of Kingston's population and occupy about one quarter of the City's rental housing stock.

In a letter from AMS Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin to the City's Planning Committee, Nevin accused the committee of designing "a policy that is discriminatory [in suggesting] that students are all alike."

"A student is a member of an occupational group as diverse as the membership of any other occupational group," wrote Nevin. "The opposition to Phase II successfully lobbied the Ontario Municipal Board to have the article revised. A new version was released on Sept. 28 of this year.

The Planning Committee staff response alleged that "it was not the intention ... to lay the ground for discriminatory bylaws," but did not deny the AMS's allegations of discrimination, or that the report's functioning definition of "student" would be outside the potential for abuse.

An evaluation of comments in the Phase II report elaborates: "The GSS develops this concern further by hypothesizing that the student housing policies would allow the City to zone certain areas as student housing and then require students to live there."

Tom Morrow, executive assistant to the vice-principal (operations and university relations), stated that "the report does not appear to properly identify the needs of the students."

Other criticisms expressed by the AMS and GSS include that the legislation will restrict the amount of student housing, forcing students to live a greater distance from campus and leading to higher student housing prices.

In the Planning Committee's words: "Under the proposed framework student accommodation would be allowed as of right based on the number of persons to be accommodated and the building type" and also "establishing numbers of students per household that are appropriate for the building type and unit size."

The AMS contests that the Planning Committee "lacks awareness of the real state of many of the rental units in this area."

Rupert Dobbin, the City's director of Planning and Urban Renewal, said the Planning Committee "as a group, are quite aware of the situation."

But "there is no single law to solve the problem," he said. "It looks black and white, but it isn't."

Dobbin defends Phase II's suggestion for "stronger bylaws, better enforcement and policing of student activities."

"If there's a small number of students we don't care," said Dobbin. "Large numbers are our concern."

"Smaller groups police themselves, in large groups societal behaviour breaks down and you need a controlling mechanism," he said.

Dobbin also explained the AMS's charges of discrimination as "positive discrimination for their benefit."

"We don't want student barns, we need more parameters to make it work properly," Dobbin said.

But Nevin disagrees. "[The proposals are] an excuse not to do anything about the area. What they're trying to do is zone out things like drunkenness," she said.

Changing the terminology of certain key words like "students" to "persons with the occupation of student" and "student housing" to "high-density area" would reduce the discrimination inherent in Phase II, Nevin said.

"If [Phase II] doesn't work either redesign it or forget it. It's an honest effort. We're not trying to slam anybody," she said.

Philips "thrilled" at Yes to OUSA

BY JEFF GRAY
The Queen's Journal

Queen's students will be paying their dues in the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance next year, and Alma Mater Society President Katherine Philips is breathing easy.

Queen's students passed a 95-cent student interest fee to fund OUSA in last week's referendum, by a margin of 273 votes out of 2,799 votes cast.

"I'm so thrilled that OUSA passed," Philips said in an interview with The Journal Sunday.

"I really didn't know what to expect," she said. "The issue ended up being about membership [in OUSA] and not about [OUSA's] policy," Philips added.

"We really want to take the opportunity now to have an excellent education campaign, not just about OUSA, but about educational issues in general."

Philips said she thought there was "a comprehensive discussion" about OUSA on campus, and blamed this on "a lot of misinformation" that she said was circulating during the campaign.

"The key thing is that now we have the money, and we will be able to be effective," Philips said.

The money, which she said will amount to about $10,200 from Queen's undergrads, will be used to set up an administrative structure for OUSA, with one or two permanent staff members and an office in Toronto.

All of OUSA's member schools are to contribute money proportionate to their student populations. With OUSA's current membership of Queen's, Brock, Laurier, Waterloo, and soon-to-be ratified Western, the total amount will be around $80,000.

OUSA was formed two years ago. It put out a document entitled Students for Change which called for hikes in student tuition as long as they were accompanied with student aid reform, in the form of an income-contingent loan repayment plan, and matched by greater contributions from both government and corporate coffers.

OUSA is releasing a document of recommendations to the provincial government this week, Philips said.

Part of the document will be a response to the Council of Ontario Universities' proposals to increase tuition up to 50 per cent. But it will also present proposals which deal with accountability, accessibility, student aid reform, and discretionary fees charged by universities, such as the Queen's $100 compulsory student assistance levy.

The report will tell the provincial government that "our student aid is not adequate to allow for substantial tuition increases," Philips said.

Philips said she hopes "there will be more discussion about the policies that OUSA is advocating, and more student input - because OUSA is supposed to be a flexible organization that responds to the current needs of students."

Confusion over ASUS referendum

Mixed messages cause cancellation of CFRC call-in show

BY BRAD ELDER
The Queen's Journal

The Queen's radio station had to scramble to avoid dead air last Tuesday night when their call-in show, scheduled to tackle the Surface debate, was cancelled.

According to Jerome Poon Ting, the program assistant at CFRC, members of the No and Yes sides for the Surface referendum had been organized to take part in a call-in show on Tuesday night.

The show, he said, was designed to solicit "people's opinion on Surface... see what people think."

But the plug was pulled late Tuesday afternoon at a Surface open forum in Victoria Hall, when Stephanie Lane, Arts and Science Undergraduate Society internal affairs commissioner, informed Poon Ting that the show could not go to air.

At that time, Poon Ting said, Lane explained that the referendum blackout - the time when all campaigning must cease - was 8 p.m. that night. The CFRC call-in show was scheduled to be an hour-long broadcast beginning at 10 p.m., and could therefore not be run.

Poon Ting told The Journal that he should have been informed of the blackout time earlier. "We only found out" because we happened to have gone down "to the open forum, he said.

As a result, he said, "we had to have an hour-show pulled up from scratch."

But according to Lane, who was not involved in planning the call-in show, CFRC should have known that the blackout was set at 8 p.m.

"[The blackout] was never set at midnight," she said, "it was always set at 8 p.m."

"We've known since the beginning of September. [It was] announced at [ASUS] Assembly... everyone knew about it," said Lane.

The blackout was set at 8 p.m. to compensate for a new ASUS policy, under which ASUS "has to open a polling station one hour after campaigning ends in the residence system," Lane explained.

Lane said that she had the support of ASUS Assembly and executive to have the blackout commence at 8 p.m.

However, Poon Ting said that Darren Littlejohn, who was speaking on behalf of the No side for ASUS, had informed him that the blackout was to take effect at midnight.

Littlejohn told The Journal that while he did have dialogue with Poon Ting, he "never told him that the ASUS blackout was at 12."

Littlejohn, who is the returning officer for the Alma Mater Society, explained that he could "only have been speaking on behalf of the AMS - I don't have privy to [speak about the ASUS blackout]."

He speculated there may have been a miscommunication between himself and Poon Ting, and said "CFRC certainly deserves our apology" for the misunderstanding.

Littlejohn said that at the time he was not aware of the ASUS stipulation which necessitated an 8 p.m. blackout.

He added that "by no means did anyone mean to mislead CFRC."

Poon Ting was concerned about more than just the inconvenience caused to CFRC. He told The Journal that holding an advanced polling station in residence just two hours after the residence Surface debate did not allow a sufficient "grace period" for first-year students to make their decision.

First-year students voted on both the ASUS society elections and the future of Surface in the advanced poll, and Poon-Ting said ASUS officials were "deciding to kill two birds with one stone."

Student Constables get funding

BY TARA JACKSON
The Queen's Journal

Queen's students have convincingly shown their support for the on-campus Student Constables program. In last week's referendum, 2,453 students voted in favour of the 50-cent contribution to the constables, while 432 voted against the fee.

Head Constable Sue Cameron, who admitted that she was nervous about the outcome of the referendum, was very pleased with the news received on Friday.

"It's great to see how much student support is out there," she said.

When asked how the referendum results translated into student opinions of the constable program, Cameron said she felt it was a positive reinforcement. "It shows that other students respect the fact that we are a valuable service on campus and that we are working with our peers," she said.

According to Cameron, the quality of the constable service will remain the same, but the charge-out rate will be maintained at a low level. The charge-out rate is the fee that groups must pay in order to hire Student Constables for events. The lower charge-out rate will enable groups who were previously unable to afford constables to make use of the service, Cameron said.

Previously, the cost of hiring one constable for one hour was $9.57. The hourly wage has been dropped to $8.85 and now that each student will be contributing 50 cents to the program, the constables will be able to maintain this lower level of pay while improving productivity.

Currently there are 73 Student Constables employed on campus.

ASUS students turn down Surface

meeting was a technicality, to give the "rubber stamp" of legitimacy to the referendum. "I don't see anyone voting against it," he said.

Michael Carnegie, vice-chair of the No campaign, said his side is "not making any extraordinary efforts" to stack the general meeting in their favour. This "worries me, in a way," he admitted.

Dick estimated that upper-year students played a large part of the No majority. First-year students, he believed, helped the Yes side because they had not seen the work of Surface over previous years.

Lagtapon and Anderson disagreed. "With upper-years we have had a lot of support. They have known us over the years and appreciated the work," Anderson said. However, they said the choice of the No side to target first-year students affected the referendum outcome.

Lagtapon alleged that the No side deliberately misrepresented the facts surrounding Surface funding. "They said that Surface had funding in the past and would get it indefinitely," he said. "That is not the case."

Meanwhile Dick said that there was "absolutely no misrepresentation" of funding. Students have paid "tens of thousands of dollars through the past years," he said.

At the ASUS Annual General Meeting last spring, ASUS Assembly voted to guarantee Surface funding levels at $6,000 for the next five years.

Anderson and Lagtapon criticized the No side for focusing on the funding of Surface, rather than on the Surface mandate, which they felt was the real issue.

"It was very clever, a political move...it was a red herring," Anderson said. "No one really cares about the funding, it is 59 cents per Arts and Science student."

The campaign did not run smoothly for either group. The No side was fined for violating campaign regulations. A poster, which had to be taken down before the referendum on October 13, was left up in the John Deutsch University Centre until October 15. There has not been a ruling on violations by the Yes side, whom Carnegie alleges is also guilty.

The idea for a new paper is "in the works" he said, one where "ASUS is responsible for what they print."

A paper that was completely editorially autonomous would be dangerous, Carnegie explained, because it would leave ASUS legally liable without giving ASUS any power. A preferable situation, he said, would be one in which ASUS "not only recommended to the editor but in fact [had] a bit of power over the editor."

Carnegie said the referendum has made campus media more responsible - "the media realize they have a responsibility to their readers. We're not here to censor or tell people what to write. We're here to make sure that the media listens to the people who actually fund them."

"I think that we've stopped funding something that's bad," Dick said. "Surface is not the only voice for marginalized groups, it is the voice for a racist elite."

Meanwhile, Lagtapon and Anderson remain hopeful about the future of their paper. "We'll see what happens at the general meeting," Anderson said. "We're still collecting articles for the next issue - discrimination at Queen's."

Carnegie said that with Surface disassociated from ASUS, "it is time to get back to work on something that is more inclusive."

Students support special needs

BY TARA ROY
The Queen's Journal

In last week's referendum, Queen's students voted overwhelmingly in favour of a $3 annual fee to help students with special needs.

The unofficial figures for the Alma Mater Society referendum were 2,279 in favour, and 590 against.

Andrea Gray, co-chairperson of the AMS Accessibility Task Force, said that she was extremely happy with the results. "We didn't just win by 50 per cent... It demonstrates strong student support," she said. "I think it's a wonderful cause, and one that people are more aware of."

Approximately $90,000 will be collected annually from students for the next five years. This money is to be used by the task force to fund new technical aids, initiate educational awareness programs, and make Queen's a more accessible campus for present and future students.

Although it might sound like a lot of money, Gray explained, the nature of the program necessitates that amount. "The money goes pretty quickly," she said.

Before the votes were counted, Gray was concerned that students would not endorse the issue. "After I saw the results of students opting out, I was very worried. When I saw how many people opted-out of things like the United Way - and we were asking $3 - it stood out as a lot of money," she said.

Gray expressed her understanding that some students are here with little money, a reality which might have prompted some to vote against the motion.

With support from the student body, the Accessibility Task Force can now perform its function. "Now that we know we're secure in funding... It's a matter of approaching Queen's administration to see which buildings will be 'attacked' first," said Gray.

Some of the projects the committee is looking into include making the Grey House at 51 Queen's Crescent more accessible to students with a physical disability, and technical additions to the Douglas Library's special needs reading room, like an intercom system to tell students the library is closing and a fire alarm.

In addition to physical changes, there is also a move to heighten awareness on campus. One of Gray's plans is to set up sign language courses so that students can learn a practical skill and "be better prepared to go out into the world and be more aware," she said.

Another part of the task force's mandate is to help enhance Queen's reputation on issues of accessibility. According to Gray, "Queen's has a reputation for being particularly inaccessible to people with physical handicaps... probably because it's such an old school."

Gray said that infrastructure for the special needs program has never been established, and that the task force has spent the first month of school setting up allocation structures regarding who can apply for special funding and how those requests should be processed. She added that the task force has also had to concentrate on the referendum.

The question of funding for special needs was first approved by referendum in 1988. Gray said the student government felt awareness of special needs issues needed to be raised, and so the AMS Accessibility Task Force was formed.

The issue is put to referendum every five years, Gray said, "because it's not opt-outable, we want to give students a chance to vote on it."

Gray said this procedure makes the committee more accountable. "They know they'll be evaluated every five years - I think it's sort of healthy for everybody," said Gray.

The task force wants to consolidate as much data as possible in order to provide the best resources to the students who need them.

One of the best ways to get that information is through the students themselves. Gray and the rest of the committee are constantly gathering material, but she said, they would "also appreciate the input of any student... There's only nine of us - I'm sure there are things we've missed."

DOWNTOWN KINGSTON

ASSEMBLY REPORT

BY JEFF GRAY
The Queen's Journal

Thursday's Alma Mater Society Assembly discussed, among other things, student housing issues, residence sexual harassment policies, barring AMS committee events from downtown bars, and having residence students run around pretending to kill each other.

New principal praised

AMS President Katherine Phillips and Rector David Baar praised recently announced Principal-Elect William Leggett.

Both Baar and Phillips sat on the committee which recommended Leggett's appointment to the Board of Trustees.

Student Housing

Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin told Assembly that "now is the time to be vocal" when it comes to housing issues. Nevin said it was important the AMS help fight the city's controversial Phase II proposals, which call for a separate zoning designation for student housing. Nevin said the proposals "discriminate against students" and that the city "hasn't dealt with student concerns in the Phase II document."

Sexual harassment policy in residence

During Question Period, Rector David Baar asked Main Campus Residents' Council President Warren Flannery if there had been any progress on a sexual harassment policy in residence.

Flannery said a committee was currently developing "the whole kit and kaboodle" of a sexual harassment policy for residence, but that MCRC has "some problems with the report" and "doesn't support the draft [the committee has] come up with."

Baar followed up his question by asking what programs are in place right now.

Flannery said there is a sexual assault advisor program in residence, and that other procedures include the Senate and University grievance procedures, MCRC discipline for minor cases, and the AMS Judicial Committee.

Barring AMS committee events at off-campus bars

A motion put forward by Education Commissioner Clare Fielding asking Assembly to approve a policy that would limit all AMS committees to on-campus facilities when booking alcoholic events met with some resistance from Assembly, and was to be tabled to the next meeting, to return with some suggested amendments.

Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell, although admitting that she had not spoken with all of her committees about the proposal, said she was strongly in favour of the motion.

"If I support the AMS mission statement, then I have to support this motion. Morally, I just have to support this motion," Mitchell said.

The motion's reasoning, as stated in the policy's preamble, is that AMS events at off-campus bars are "not accessible to all undergraduate students."

By accessible, the policy refers to not only physical accessibility, but personal safety and discrimination on the basis of race, ethnicity, sexual orientation and gender.

Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Representative Mike Hammer said he thought there should be "room for compromise" in the policy. He said that instead of withdrawing to the protection of our own campus, "we should be doing more educational things, pushing [downtown bars] to make changes, and integrating with the people in Kingston, instead of saying 'it's not accessible' and leaving."

AMS President Katherine Phillips asked how the policy would affect committees that want to hold events out of town, such as Queen's Model Parliament, which has held its events in Ottawa in the past.

Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell said she recognized that "all of these are valid concerns ... but the concerns are all secondary to making events safe."

"People have approached downtown bars to make changes, and they haven't," Mitchell said.

Fielding said all 11 of the committees under her commission had no problem with the policy, and Mitchell said her committees were aware of the proposal.

Communications Commissioner Nevin said the policy "may become a political obstacle in the future" for committees in her commission, as it would prohibit events sponsored by the AMS to take place at City Hall, for example.

Nevin suggested the policy be amended to include only events primarily directed at students.

ASUS Rep Hammer made the motion to table the policy, with the proposed amendments forthcoming, to the next Assembly meeting.

Students in residence may kill each other

Campus Activities Commissioner Mitchell brought forward the Undergrad

Games Co-chair, Cheyanne Church, to discuss a fundraising idea they have for residence students. Based on the "Gotcha" or "Assassin" games, each participant would pay $2.50 and be assigned a person who they would have to "kill," or touch with a game card.

Education Commissioner Fielding said the "killing and stalking and the whole terminology surrounding the game" disturbed her.

A number of Assembly members said they had organized or participated in similar games, and said they were successful.

Alison Mitchell said she would have the Undergraduate Games fundraising proposal brought back before Assembly with some revisions, even though she is not mandated to do so. "I'm not really sure if we should proceed with the event," Mitchell said.

Surface resurfaces

Concurrent Education President Pete Shtart asked ASUS President Jenn Steeves about violations of referendum rules by the No side in the referendum on funding for Surface magazine. He said that some No side posters were left up during the blackout period of the referendum.

Steeves said the No side of the referendum will be fined for their infractions.

Of note...

Assembly gave second reading and final approval to constitutional changes which would change the structure of Orientation Week, giving the residence councils control over the residence days at the beginning of the week by dissolving the Alma Mater Society Orientation Committee, and creating an Orientation round-table to replace Allias.

Visual artist protests Mulroney

BY KRISTEN KUNNAS
The Queen's Journal

Canadian visual artist and Sci '73 grad Larry Rosnuk visited Queen's on Friday to show his sculpture, "Homage to Brian Mulroney."

The sculpture is a caricature of Brian Mulroney's profile turned into a rocket adorned with stars and stripes, shafting a red maple leaf.

Rosnuk said he created the piece "out of total frustration [with what] Mulroney has done to Canada."

Kingston is just one stop on a "political-like" tour that Rosnuk refers to as the "Remember Lynn' Brian Tour." He said the purpose of this tour is "to raise public awareness of the devastation Brian Mulroney and the federal Conservatives have caused to the people of Canada and the country."

And with only one week left before the federal election, Rosnuk said he is outraged that no one is mentioning Mulroney, who should be put on trial as a traitor [to Canada], he said.

"Mulroney's turned Canada into an American lackey," said Rosnuk. "We have no national identity."

Rosnuk said he wants Canadians to heed the fact that regardless of Kim Campbell's gender, her mandate as a PC is the same as Mulroney's was. "She's voted for everything he's stood for ... Kimbo is the same."

Rosnuk has proposed building a sixty foot high replica of his sculpture in the Ottawa area. "[Hopefully] it would deter politicians [from] shafting the people of Canada," he reflected.

His vision of Canada is of "a country which treats everyone with respect, and guarantees the right to good health and education," he said.

With respect to the youth of Canada, Rosnuk said he believes that it is important to get active in elections and know what the issues are.

"Be politically active," Rosnuk said. "But more importantly, be politically aware."

nation is that there's a reluctance on the part of some of our people to participate in the dominant society's political processes, because they see that it may be a contravention of their own self-determination, of their own sovereignty."

Furthermore, Mercredi said, "the mainstream parties have never given our people a real reason to go out and vote for them. Historically, the parties have ignored our people and their issues."

While Mercredi said the timing of his book's release - just before the federal election - is "coincidence... it's helped me get the attention of the media, and through that I'm able to try to get a higher profile for native issues during the election."

In terms of native issues, Mercredi feels "the public awareness is there in terms of the need to do something."

He cited recent "watershed events" such as the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, and the Oka crisis, which have "awakened the interest of many Canadians, and made the governments realize that they have to act. One would think that two incidents in our recent history should be sufficient enough to make sure that we address the issues immediately, as opposed to delaying them for another time."

Mercredi believes "the defeat of the Charlottetown Accord has been interpreted by governments as a rejection of the claims that the aboriginal people have made. The net result is that there's very little interest in constitutional discussions, and the politicians are afraid to raise the issue."

"My interpretation was that it was a rejection of the collective rights of the people I represent," he said.

Asked how he reacts to those who question his leadership, Mercredi said, "it's rather amazing, but that's how it works. If things are going well, then people will want to give you credit, and if things aren't working too well, they would want to let you know that they're not happy with you. I don't take the blame for the lack of attention of aboriginal issues, because I've been there knocking on the doors."

Besides writing In the Rapids, Mercredi has spent most of his time lately travelling among native communities, "dealing with the issues at the community level, but also opening schools, and more recently, being part of the opening of a triple-A hockey team in LeBret, Saskatchewan."

of discrimination found in sexual assault helps to answer the questions, "why do we even need a woman's centre, women only space, feminist approaches taught in classes or even a degree program in Women's Studies?" The reality is that everyone is subject to some type of discrimination, but women face an entire sphere of hatred and danger diluting the norm. As such, we have an obligation to try and understand what drives and breeds this systemic abuse of women in particular.

I fear the day when our society has "I'm sorry that you were raped" Hallmark cards. I can see it now: "Thinking of you in your time of undress..."

Last night I was asked if I hated men. I don't hate men. I hate ignorance. Excuse me, I have to go. I have an appointment with the Police to look at mugshots.

ASUS President on Surface

The Editor,

There continues to be many different understandings about the fate of Surface and its continued funding through the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society (ASUS). The only way to ensure complete understanding of this question is to recount approximately two and a half years of the paper's recent history. As space is limited, here are the facts as I know them for the last six months.

ASUS received a petition of more than eight per cent of Arts and Science students. The petition requested that a referendum be called on the following question: "Do you support the continued funding of the newspaper Surface by all undergraduate Arts and Science students through the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society?"

Any petition of this nature must be presented by the ASUS executive to the assembly of the society to select an appropriate date for the referendum. The next ASUS assembly was on March 22, 1993. This meeting was the scheduled Annual General Meeting. All Arts and Science students have speaking and voting privileges at an Annual General Meeting. An Annual General Meeting has more "power" than a regular ASUS assembly according to the ASUS constitution. For example, constitutional changes which require two regular assembly meetings may be passed at one Annual General Meeting. This meeting was convened. It was brought to the attention of the past ASUS executive, that the meeting was not advertised according to the guidelines set by the ASUS constitution. The meeting was then cancelled and rescheduled to April 6th.

The April 6th meeting was held. At this meeting it was determined that the referendum would take place in conjunction with the ASUS elections in October. During this meeting a motion from the floor was brought forward that read, "That ASUS assembly approve the guaranteed funding of Surface at its current level of $6,000 through unallocated funds for the 1993/1994 and the 1994/1995 school terms." This motion passed at the meeting. There have been MANY different interpretations of this motion. The society does have monies invested that are not allocated to any projects for the society. The intention of the motion as stated in discussion of the question was to OVERRIDE any outcome of the upcoming referendum. The new ASUS executive, both Heath and I opposed this motion, on the basis that as elected representatives we should respond to students' opinions.

Surface funding has been determined since 1989 by an agreement made between the ASUS executive and Surface stipulating that the funding of the paper would decrease from $12,000 by $2,000 each year until the paper was self-sufficient. Also according to this agreement and the ASUS constitution Surface was to provide the society with one page of space in each edition of the paper or 5 per cent, which ever was greater.

Heath Grant and I ran for the ASUS executive in February on a platform of supporting the newspaper. We were elected with 71.2 per cent of the voters' support. Our proposal was that Surface be given $4,000 of funding from ASUS continuing the trend set by the 1989 executive. We also proposed to purchase an additional page in the paper in an effort to increase the ASUS content of the paper and to improve awareness of ASUS. The additional page in ten issues was to be sold to the society for a total of $2,000 for the year. When the ASUS budget was presented to the newly elected assembly on April 8th it was passed according to this proposal.

Heath and I also ran on an election platform of representing the students within Arts and Science. A total of 2,128 Arts and Science students voted in the referendum. Those in favour of the question were 944 and those opposed 1,184. The ASUS constitution does not stipulate if the referendum results are binding on ASUS assembly. It has been decided by the ASUS executive and the ASUS assembly that a Special General Meeting will be held on November 4th in the Lower Lounge of Victoria Hall. This date has been set according to the ASUS constitution. A Special General Meeting must be held in order to override the motion passed at the April 6th Annual General Meeting. This is the ONLY way that ASUS can act according to the referendum results. All Arts and Science students will have voting privileges at this meeting. Students who wish to vote will be required to bring their student cards to the meeting. The motions that will be put forward will do two things. First, remove Surface from the ASUS constitution. Second, declare all motions previously made concerning the funding of Surface void. Although the spirit of these motions are not a reflection of our beliefs about Surface, we feel that as elected representatives we must act according to the results of the referendum. All monies currently held in Surface accounts will be placed in a new account in which Heath as Chief Financial Officer will have signing authority. I encourage all Arts and Science students to attend the Special General Meeting. The next ASUS assembly meeting will be held on Thursday October 21st in the McLaughlin Room of the John Deutsch University Centre and all Arts and Science students are welcome to attend this meeting to express their views on this issue.

It is my personal hope that Surface will be able to gain sufficient funding as an independent paper to continue to foster very necessary discourse on this campus.

The Femme Fatale Gone Awry

through the lives of Tony, Roz and Charis, Zenia bats two out of three as far as their male companions go: one dead and one missing-in-action. It's no wonder that when she makes her second appearance - back from the grave, no less! - the three women are far from pleased.

What Atwood has done is taken the stock figure of the femme fatale, rescued from the world of film noir and dime-store detective novels, and given her a new spin. Now, viewed through the eyes of women themselves, this femme is just as fatale, but no longer as two-dimensional. Even when the three friends try to squeeze Zenia into various archetypes of the man-eating woman (Jezebel, the Whore of Babylon, the Robber Bride), she slips the noose of these overly simplistic descriptions.

She is to be both feared and admired: Zenia sweeps through life like a prow, like a gal- leon. She's magnificent, she's unique. She's the sharp edge.

Zenia has, at the same time, no history and many histories. Was her mother a White Russian who prostituted her to survive? Is she the daughter of a Romanian gypsy? Were her parents Jews butchered during the Holocaust? Nobody knows for sure, even after Roz hires a detective to snoop out the truth.

The only constant is her connection with the war, her direct experience of it. While the individual men in the novel tend to be milquetoasts, war serves as a reminder of the male world within which the three friends still live. War is what fathers did or didn't return from. War is what lovers have dodged across the border to escape. War is what "lady-like" historians should not be interested in. For Tony, Roz and Charis, Zenia provides a glimpse into this men's club of violence and death, from a woman's perspective. And by entering their lives, Zenia brings war - metaphorical this time - to shatter their calm domestic worlds.

The novel falters a little with certain characters. Roz's gay office assistant, Boyce, who quotes poetry ad nauseam and has an oh-so-impeccable sense of couture, is a cringe-making caricature. Thankfully his stage appearances are few and far between.

More damaging is Charis, the New Age flake whose story takes up much of the book's middle section. She teaches yoga, reads auras, and consults Tarot cards for advice - one can imagine her worrying about "bad vibes." But all these hippy-fied details never add up to much, and she remains hopelessly diaphanous, at times simply "not-there." The book seems built like a hammock: taut and moored tightly at either end, but amorphous and sagging in these central sections.

Perhaps it's because I'm just back from the West Coast, where Charis would be downright normal, conservative even. Out on the Gulf Islands, lightly misted with sandalwood and skunk weed, there are a thousand Charises selling batik and healing crystals and teaching classes in rolfing and aromatherapy. But these actual people are both more oddball and more substantial than Charis ever becomes.

Roz and especially Tony, however, are two of Atwood's most vivid creations. Tony seems to have a monopoly on all the best character details: she collects weeds and flowers from famous battlesites; she recreates these same battles on a 3-D map, using kitchen spices for the warring armies; and despite her soft-spoken mien, she has a wonderfully blunt and unromantic worldview: Tony has compiled a mental list of these televised synonyms for death: "You're toast, you're fried, you're wasted, you're steak, you're dead meat." It's odd how many of them have to do with food, as if being reduced to nutrients is the final indignity. But "you're history" has long been one of her favourites.

In the end, Tony, with help from Roz, gives the novel its real strength. Charis is like a wounded comrade whom the others must carry along; she is necessary, but slows them all down. The bigger question - and one that Atwood leaves appropriately unanswered - is that by cracking the enigma of Zenia, are these three women coming into or fleeing from the unhappy realm of history?

DAVID LEACH is currently working on a novel, tentatively entitled Sirings.

The three most short-lived traces: the trace of a bird on a branch, the trace of a fish on a pool, and the trace of a man on a woman - an Irish triad

In 1840's Ireland, on an island echoing of folk lore, famine and magic, the story of the lives of three generations of women begins in Jane Urquhart's latest novel, Away.

The women in the family are said to lean towards extremes - especially in matters of the heart. Writing with a poetically surreal voice, Urquhart traces the paths of the O'Malley women, from Mary's struggle to stay alive in famine-stricken Ireland, to Eileen's political antics in 1860's Canada, to Esther and the farmhouse near Colborne, Ontario, where she lies awake at night, recounting the history of her predecessors to herself over and over again.

The O'Malley women have also always had a peculiar affinity for large bodies of water, an attraction which perhaps had its roots in Mary's initial experience of being "away." As a young girl she rescues a young man, a shipwreck victim, and promptly falls asleep on his chest upon reaching the shore. That is how her mother, the priest, and a handful of other islanders had found her... asleep in the arms of a dead young sailor... they believed [she] was lying in the arms of her fairy-daemon lover. Abductions from the sea were a common occurrence on Rathlin Island, and the spell the sailor casts upon Mary bewitches her and all her female descendants. Mary retreats into her own world. She had been touched, had become significant, and because of this all around her had become insignificant, distant beside the still reality of the young man's body. She would seek out her lover in the movement of the sea: He was the exact spot where the sea touches land, the precise moment of the final reach of surf. That was the place and the time of him. She would forever, then, seek shorelines and beaches.

Despite Mary's abandonment of the everyday world, she marries, and her sympathetic landlords arrange for her family to emigrate to Canada as the famine sweeps over the island. They are allotted a small, infertile piece of land in northern Ontario, where Eileen is born, with the same dreamy intuitions as her mother. Before Eileen is very old, however, Mary disappears, in search of the big lake where she can find the one who truly possesses her body and soul.

The hardships of life on an unworkable farm drive Eileen and her brother to southern Ontario and the shores of Port Hope soon after the death of their father. Eileen, who has never seen a body of water larger than the brook that ran across the farm, is at once mesmerized and overcome by Lake Ontario. "I can't look," she stammered, "I'm afraid." She leaned, exhausted, against Genesis [the cow]. "It's mine and I know nothing about it. It doesn't have another side." Eileen was more comfortable with the lake in the darkness, though the air was moist with its presence, and only when the train rattled over the trestle bridge was she able to stop listening for the conversation she knew the waves were having with the shore.

In Port Hope, besides finally encountering the mystery of the water which had haunted and would continue to haunt her ancestors and children, Eileen encounters Aidan Lanighan, a dancing Irish Canadian patriot. The discrimination of the English in Canada against the Irish resurfaces often in the book, and though Eileen's brother remains unmoved by the plight of the Irish people whose traditions are no longer significant to him, Eileen, who bears the suffering of her mother and father in her breast, sympathizes with the "cause" of the Irish Canadians as if she herself had suffered through the famine. The moment that Lanighan comes dancing into her life, she is hypnotized by the patriotism and sadness that dominate his soul - and, like her mother before her after her encounter with the dead sailor, Eileen retreats from the tangible world. She danced herself behind Lanighan's eyes and knew, suddenly, the dark pitch of the bellies of lakeboats, intense political agendas, a sordid shun childhood, nights at crowded Montreal boarding houses. She knew Lanighan's voice, his abandoned song, his pain, his silence... In his arms she was assaulted, stolen, by a learned mythology.

Eileen's involvement with Lanighan leads her to abandon the prosperous new farm, seek out Lanighan in the slums of Montreal, and embroils her in political scandal in Ottawa - and ultimately leaves her with a broken heart.

The novel extends to the present, with Esther, Eileen's granddaughter, alone in the farmhouse, listening to the curse of the mines her family was destined to suffer after Eileen and her brother sold their northern farm to gold-miners. Esther, as the end of the line of the women of extremes, struggles to keep the memory of her family alive in her own mind.

Urquhart's novel is a compelling read, and her command of images and language is formidable. Her prose dances like Lanighan's fleet Irish jigs and flows like the water that runs throughout the novel. She weaves the plight of Ireland during the famine, the Irish emigrations to Canada, and the traditions of folk lore together with great prowess. But Away is, above all, a book about identity and its legacy. "You have this gift in you," Eileen tells Esther, "the ability to be where you are, but I am in you as well and there will be times when you want to drift away."

Jane Urquhart will be reading from Away on Nov. 17 at 7 p.m. at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

"In the beginning was the word... but there was no television coverage, so we'll never know for sure." - Author Unknown

The word is out. Television, that wicked monster of the post-modern/post-mortem world, is preparing to launch yet another attack on our deadened and image-addicted minds. This may seem paranoid, but it's hard not to get the feeling that television has set its unblinking eye on the project of turning literature into another glorified commercial - just as it did with politics.

Recently, some masterminds in the United States announced plans for a twenty-four hour book channel, complete with movies based on books and programs dealing with writing and writers. Here's the catch: viewers can phone in and order any of the books displayed on the channel. This is it, folks - the home-shopping network for pedantic couch potatoes.

We've all heard the lamentations about the declining quality of literature, so this recent development is not a big surprise. Peddling books like Ginsu knives seems consistent with the undignified depths to which literature has been said to have sunk ever since television took control of public discourse. Whether this channel will work in literature's favour or not, remains, quite literally, to be seen.

Far from the multi-million dollar shenanigans of American cable broadcasters, Ontario's public television channel, TVO, has negotiated the struggle between image and word, television and literature, with surprising success. Imprint is an hour of commercial-free television devoted to the world of writing.

Neil Postman, one of the media's sharpest critics, has said that "television is at its most trivial... and most dangerous when its aspirations are high, when it presents itself as a carrier of important cultural conversations." Imprint succeeds where the rest of "cultural" television fails because it lacks these pretensions. Instead, the program focuses on writers and their work, tracing the sources of the most essential cultural conversations to their foundations: books and the issues which fill them.

Imprint relies on a discussion-based approach that is rare for television, but in keeping with literary traditions. The show offers lengthy interviews with authors conducted by other writers; a host with no television experience, just a love for books; and regular roundtable discussions dealing with a variety of topics, debated by an assortment of writers and thinkers. Imprint has earned the respect of many who earn their living from words rather than images. Past writers who have participated in Imprint include Margaret Atwood and Nobel Prize winner Toni Morrison.

Imprint does not offer discounts or try to sell viewers the latest Stephen King novel. Instead of displaying a number to dial to place an order, it gives reading lists and sources. Far from being trivial or dangerous, Imprint is television that seeks to do justice to literature and not just do business with it. The bottom line it pushes is still the type found in a book.

Imprint airs on TVO Monday nights at 10 p.m.

Pressure on Gaels after loss to Ottawa

BY GEOFF OWEN
The Queen's Journal

The Queen's Golden Gaels went down early. At 9:33 of the opening quarter, the Ottawa Gee Gees drove down to the Gaels' 2 yard line and proceeded to score on the strength of some straight ahead power football. Ottawa 7, Queen's 0. After the ensuing kickoff, however, things quickly changed.

Receiver Ed Kidd, renowned for the precision with which he runs every passing route, ran a circuit and gained a step on Ottawa half-back Hency Charles. After rolling out to his left, Steve Othen (Gaels quarterback) threw a high, tight, arcing spiral that nestled itself softly into Kidd's hands. The receiver tucked the parcel firmly under his left arm and scampered the remaining 44 yards for a touchdown. Ottawa 7, Queen's 7.

If only this were a perfect world. Instead, Charles opted to drag Kidd to the field before Othen's pass arrived. The fifteen yard pass interference penalty proved to be the Gaels' most impressive offensive gain in the first half and the rest of the game was never close. Final score: Ottawa 34, Queen's 12.

The Gaels were an uninspired

Gaels in a must-win situation.

Marika Glickman

bunch throughout most of the contest. Their poor effort in the opening half was as surprising as it was disappointing considering the victory over the Carleton Ravens last week. On the defensive side of the ball, tackles were missed, blocks were not shed and receivers were allowed to catch short, quick passes almost at will. Last year, the Gaels' secondary intercepted 22 passes and scored 5 touchdowns. This season's totals going into the Ottawa game were 4 and 0 respectively; including Saturday's effort, those numbers remain 4 and 0.

The defensive unit picked up their intensity at halftime and played a solid second half. They allowed only one field goal until the last play of the game when Ottawa scored a purely aesthetic touchdown.

The offense sputtered in the first half too, they never managed to cross midfield. They mustered less than 70 yards total offense in the opening 30 minutes and, as offensive co-ordinator Bob Howes said, "[Ottawa] beat us everywhere."

Much like the defense, the offense gave a superior effort in the second half. With Rob Weir as quarterback, there was a more consistent and effective attack. He passed for 215 yards and two touchdowns. Unfortunately, drives were consistently stalled by penalties and miscues until 10:36 of the fourth quarter when Weir hit Dan McCullough for a five yard touchdown strike. Weir also connected with Paul Kozan for a 19 yard score at 13:35. If the Gaels were able to score earlier in the half a comeback would have been possible, especially with the leadership Weir displayed. Credit, then, must go to the Gee Gees defense for playing tough football.

The Gaels were the better team in the second half but they never really stood a chance in this game. The team displayed a complacency during the week of practice before the Ottawa game and in the pre-game warmup that led to the rather ugly first half. Factor into the equation Ottawa's tremendous size advantage and the result was an 18 point blowout for the less gifted team. As was the case in previous losses to Bishop's, Carleton and Concordia, a weak mental effort enabled the opposition to exploit the Gaels' size disadvantages.

Howes put it best "We can't not play at our peak level," he said.

There is the proverbial silver lining to be found, though. Currently, Queen's is tied with Carleton and Ottawa in last place. With a flair for dramatics comparable to Brad Elberg running rampant over the 'vaunted' St. Mary's defense in the 1992 Vanier Cup, the 1993 Gaels have put themselves in a must-win scenario for their final regular season game. With a victory, they're in the playoffs. Lose and they're out. A much needed offensive boost is imminent with the return of Elberg from the DL.

Catch the action this weekend when Queen's plays the alumni game against McGill. It will be huge. If everything goes according to plan, Queen's will triumph, be in the playoffs and proceed to flourish with the opportunity to defend their national championship. The alternative scenario, while entirely possible (McGill has been nationally ranked for most of the season) would be tragic. It would represent everything Queen's is not: failure, disappointment and underachievement.

Queen's on fire at Waterloo mudfest

BY JASON LEWIS
The Queen's Journal

It was a dark and stormy day. The rain pelted down on the hides of hundreds of shivering ectomorphs as they ran, slipped and grunted their way through this Saturday's Waterloo Invitational. Once again it was Queen's own eoteric of oxygen junkies who came out on top. The men's team placed second out of a dozen teams while the women garnered their habitual first place medals.

This weekend's meet was the last of the regular season and the coaches were pleased to bring a huge contingent to the event. With forty athletes still competing at the end of the season, things bode well for future years. This meet was an opportunity for all of the Ontario teams to check out the championship course before the OUAA/OWIAA's two weeks from now. Though the organizers have some glitches to work out before the finals, both of the races went well. Now for the details.

The women made a mockery of the competition placing all of their five qualifying runners in the top sixteen. Suzanne Garrett, our Rookie machine, came up with a big race and led Queen's with a seventh place finish. Captain Sophie Kenward, Our Lady of the Slow Twitch Fibre came in eighth place. Kerry MacKelvie ran a steady race and closed well for a fourteenth place finish with the inimitable Heather King right behind her. Melissa Buchan pulled off her second big race in a row and placed sixteenth. These five women along with Judy Alfassy and Sharon Shew will make up our OWIAA team. Waterloo placed second though posed no real threat to our collection of mud-splattered speedsters.

The men fared well on the treacherous course and placed second to Guelph. A steeper than ever Todd Jones ran a respectable race and placed tenth. Al Pribaz, ever the cunning tactician, came in thirteenth with tumbling Derek Hackshaw close behind in fifteenth. Paul "kiss-the-gravel" Green placed sixteenth just seconds later. Grant Strachan is back in the saddle again and rounded out Queen's first five less than a minute later. These five along with Mark Arsenault and Chris Minns will represent Queen's at the OUAA's.

For those of you who missed last week's fix of running lore, here are some results from last week's trip down to the Land of the Free. The Lehigh Pennsylvania meet was the pre-NCAA championships event. A multitude of Division One teams swarmed over the picturesque course in lightning speed. The meet was an opportunity for Queen's to "mix it up with the big dogs." The coaches were more than pleased with the performances. In the men's Invitational race the guys came 26th out of 31 teams. (The teams were made up of hired guns on scholarships, a notable number of which hail from the Great White North.) The women ran in the open race and posted an exciting fourth place finish.

These past two weeks have added further fuel to the speculative fires. The competition in Ontario in both the men's and women's divisions is the toughest it has been in years. Though the championships will be tight and exciting you can count on Queen's to be a very real contender. Stay tuned for the results in the upcoming weeks.

Rugby rout

BY ROB THOMPSON
The Queen's Journal

This is what Golden Gael rugby is all about. Queen's came out like wildfire Saturday afternoon to put an old-fashioned thrashing upon the York Yeoman 29-0. It was a total team effort and four Gaels hit the scoresheet.

It took until the seventh minute for the Gaels to take the lead, and they never looked back from that point. Patrick Wagner scored his first of two tries on the day, after some brilliant passing by the Gaels had the Yeomen tripping over their own feet.

Three minutes later, Gareth Pettigrew crossed up the York defenders with some slick moves, dished the ball to Wagner, who ran the ball in unmolested from 40 yards out. This try was converted by Pettigrew, to stake the Gaels to a 12-0 lead. Queen's was unrelenting in their pressure, as the York squad could only clear the ball from their own half on a handful of occasions.

By the 25th minute the inevitable occurred again. Drew McNaughton got the ball on the far wing after Queen's outmuscled their opponents in the scrum. McNaughton put on the afterburners, and left York eating his dust as he sped in to count the Gaels' third try of the half.

The home team added another try in the 34th minute. Big Rich King counted his first of two tries, after some clever passing by the Queen's attackers left them with 4 to 1 numbers on the near side. The lone York tackler provided no match for King's size as he powered his way in to the end zone to count the try. This try also went unconverted. The score at the end of a half totally dominated by Queen's was 22-0 in the Gaels favour. The second half didn't provide nearly the scoring excitement of the first. A pattern emerged with the Gaels applying merciless pressure, only to have the ball ultimately cleared by the York defense.

The Gaels broke this pattern in the fifteenth minute. Rich King notched his second try of the afternoon, barreling over several York defenders, after Queen's elected to run in a penalty from 15 yards out. Gareth Pettigrew nailed the convert to make the count 29-0.

It was an important win for the Gaels, who travel to McMaster next weekend to close-out the regular season against the Marauders in a battle for first place. The winner of the contest is also assured home field advantage throughout the playoffs. The Gaels are now assured a playoff spot, and appear to be building momentum to reclaim their title of OUAA champs after being unseated by McMaster last year. The first playoff games are in two weeks, with the opposition and venue yet to be determined.

Rugby team has shot at championship.

Trent totalled

BY DAN MCNAIR
The Queen's Journal

Soccer games are not usually high scoring affairs. When a team gets beat by a 4-1 margin it is often considered to be a sound thrashing. A 9-0 win, however, would be regarded as nothing short of annihilation. Such was the case last Wednesday night when Queen's hosted Trent University at Richardson Stadium.

It didn't take long for Queen's to open the scoring, approximately five minutes after the kickoff. Gaels defender Rick Boomgard found the back of the net courtesy of a Chris Turner corner kick. No less than five minutes later Trent conceded yet another goal as rookie striker Ken Butler pounced on the rebound that was a result of a powerful shot by Jonathan Soler.

The Queen's set pieces have proved highly effective in previous games and are now considered to be a definite offensive threat. A set play moments before the end of the first half produced the Gaels' third goal. Striker Ken Butler volleyed a loose ball to score his second goal of the day.

The second half was much of the same, the Gaels offense was simply overpowering and the entire Trent team seemed to yield to fatigue and hence, defeat.

Queen's were allowed to score six more unanswered goals. Jonathan Soler was the first to score in the second half, and Ken Butler was dominating as he scored the Gaels next three, giving him a final tally of five goals. Never before has a Queen's striker scored so many goals in a single OUAA game.

Rick Boomgard added his second of the night to lead the Queen's team in scoring overall. Matt Humphries redirected a shot by Dan Cheney to catch the Trent keeper going the wrong way, and score Queen's ninth goal of the night. Defenders Rich Price and Nick Thomas were outstanding as they combined with the midfield to provide more offensive firepower. Keepers Liam Stevenson and Chris Catral were never really called upon as the Trent offence was relatively obscure.

The win assured Queen's of a place in the OUAA playoffs.

Toronto terminated

BY GORAN
The Queen's Journal

The OUAA #1 Men's Tennis Gaels travelled to Toronto on Saturday to take on #3 York and #4 Toronto in a very tough match-up to close out the regular season. Travelling team members were Peter Walker, Richard Thomson, Mike Harris, Chris Birtwhistle, David McCallum, Jason Christie, and Christian McDonough. Queen's, tied for first place with Western with 26 wins, had to come up big as the Mustangs faced #6 Waterloo and #7 McMaster in their final match-up.

The Gaels came out with their most impressive showing in years, blanking Toronto 7-0 and fighting to a 5-2 victory over York. At #1 singles, Peter Walker split his two matches against very tough opponents to go 1-1. At #2 singles, Richard Thomson pulled out two impressive victories to go 2-0. At #3, Mike Harris struggled but nonetheless held on to grab both victories. At #4, Chris "shank" Birtwhistle (playing #3 against U of T) had an impressive straight set win. At #5, the impressive newcomer, Jason Christie, extended his season winning streak in singles to 5-0 with two well deserved victories.

At #1 doubles, Peter Walker and Mike Harris won their first match in a tight three-setter against U of T, but struggled against York to end up 1-1. At the #2 spot, Chris Birtwhistle and Jason Christie grabbed both victories to go 2-0 for the day.

The result of the weekend: a 12-2 win-loss record, which brings the seasons final total to a best-ever 38-11. Pending on the outcome of Western's matches, the Gaels could either finish in first or a very close second, giving the team a guaranteed birth in the playoffs next weekend in Toronto. In addition to the team accomplishment, Queen's will be sending five players to the OUAA individual championships in two weeks in London.

In doubles, Walker/Harris finished second overall in the #1 spot, while Birtwhistle/Christie finished first at the #2 spot. In singles, Richard Thomson finished first at the #2 spot to qualify. Considering that there are only four doubles teams and four singles players that qualify for this event, the representation by Queen's this year will be outstanding.

The team would like to thank Tony Roth for his superb coaching this weekend which was a significant contributing factor for the Gaels, and Christian McDonough, who provided much-needed support for the team and travelled as an alternate.

SPORTSShorts

We would like to acknowledge a mistake made in the Friday, October 8 issue of the Queen's Journal. Mr. Stoffle's (the coach of the men's hockey team) name was incorrectly spelled. We regret the error.

If any reader has an obscure sports question (involving Queen's, professional sports, rules, or anything else, please drop a letter by the Queen's Journal (272 Earl St.) with your question.

Some examples are: Who is the world snooker champion? What was the worst trade in NFL history? When did Bjorn Borg win his first of five Wimbledon's? Why doesn't Alfie's open before eight o'clock on nights when the Blue Jays are in the ALCS (probably for the World Series too but we won't find out until midweek)? Where can we get tickets to the homecoming football game? How is it possible that our football team stinks so bad after a championship season? We look forward to answering any and all questions.

Upcoming home events: The Alumni game is at Richardson Stadium this Saturday at 1:00pm. Kick off for the Old Boys soccer tournament is also at 1:00pm. Women's soccer plays at 1:00pm Sunday.

There is an action packed B-Ball Alumni weekend this Saturday and Sunday in the PEC. Women's Basketball plays Ryerson 1:30pm this Sunday in the PEC.

Hockey action begins 2:00pm Sunday at Jock Harty arena. Finally, Men's Volleyball has an exhibition Alumni tournament also this weekend.

With all of these events happening at once, we hope you are not and sitting on a couch getting fat watching T.V.-support the Gaels!

Dreadful thriller deserves death penalty

Judgment Night
Directed by Stephen Hopkins
Catalaqui Cineplex
BY CHRISTOPHER ZABEL
The Queen's Journal

There was a lot of runnin' in this movie: strategically lit down-a-scarey-deserted street runnin', suspenseful across the tops of buildings runnin', gritty and symbolic through-the-sewers runnin', slow jogs, quick sprints, worm's eye view look-at-their-shoes runnin'; indeed, a great deal of runnin' all round. If you're a track athlete, or just want to get some idea of what runnin' is all about, there's some material here you don't want to miss.

The story behind this fleet footed thriller was covered pretty thoroughly in its TV commercials. Four buddies cruise out of a shiny suburban landscape on their way to a boxing exhibition. Tragically, en route, they take a wrong turn off the expressway and find themselves in a neighbourhood where nobody leaves their homes, all of the buildings seem strangely foreboding, and the police don't answer 911 calls (isn't this how Bonfire of the Vanities started?).

To compound their troubles, Ray (the guy who played George in the episode-within-an-episode Seinfeld finale last season) runs his RV over that Puerto Rican guy from Head of the Class. (Didn't that also happen in Bonfire of the Vanities?)

Head of the Class Guy (he didn't get a name in the film), as it turns out, has a mysterious extra orifice that just happens to be the size of a bullet, which he is suspiciously reticent about. Frank (Emilio Estevez) and the boys (boyz?) quickly deduce that said bullet hole is probably connected in some way to the four guys who start breaking in the windows of their RV. And, after watching Head of the Class Guy become Brains on the Asphalt Guy, they beat a hasty retreat.

This course of action proves to be a fortunate choice, as chief meanie Fallon (Denis Leary) is an advocate of the "only good witness is a dead witness" school of thought. The rest of the movie is mostly devoted to that running I alluded to earlier.

This is a movie that forces each member of the audience to ask him/herself "Do I have what it takes?" (Or at least that's what the press kit assures me.) Emilio and his buds are challenged, morally and physically, as their primordial survival instincts are put to the test. Their entire evening of impromptu life or death athletics might have been avoided if they hadn't stopped have the courage and sheer physical endurance to vanquish the powers of darkness; hence the gun play.

The only reason to go and see this movie is to see Denis Leary's tum as el hombre diablo (unless supposed to be funny. The closest he came was, "There's a special on dead meat in the frozen food section," (the cast cum track team were running through a supermarket at the time). Granted, he was pretty snarky, and it seemed a real shame when Emilio triumphed in the concluding fisticuffs (damn, I just gave away the ending, but fans may have a difficult time reconciling his screw-the-system comic philosophy with what seems to be a sell-out-like crazy movie career.

I'd continue evaluating the "performers" one by one, but because the dialogue free nature of the action/adventure genre pretty much precludes both acting and character development, there isn't much to say. The movie does feature a soundtrack that's worth a listen. All of the tunes are collaborative efforts between alternative and hip-hop acts: Sonic Youth and Cypress Hill, Dinosaur Jr. and Del the Funky Homosapien, Helmet and House of Pain (the latter's lead singer also snagged a role as one of the forces of darkness). However, this potentially killer song collection isn't used to any noticeable advantage in the film.

My judgment? Movies like this only serve to beg the eternal "Why?", or merely reduce one to Kurtz-like whispering: the horror...the horror.

Operation: the wacky doctors' game to check the guy they hit with the RV.

However, Emilio, humanist and paragon of virtue that he is, propels the group to new planes of ethical consciousness and they stop to see if the guy is alive. And that's what it's all about, right, people helping people. Do unto others, y'know. However, it isn't enough to have sound values; you've also got to you're one of those Estevez obsessive types...I know you sickos are out there). Leary is that fast talking, chain smoking, in your face, hyper sarcastic guy from the Bo Jackson shoe commercials. It would appear that he is attempting to broaden his career. Unfortunately, although he is undoubtedly super cool, it's unclear what exactly he is doing in this stinker. He's a comedian. He's

Just doing it themselves

The pride of Moncton comes to Kingston

An Interview with Eric's Trip
BY CHRISTIAN DEBRUJIN
The Queen's Journal

From Moncton New Brunswick, Eric's Trip started in June 1990 while all the members were still in high school. They released two indie-cassettes before playing live, and with their fourth release 1991's Warm Girl, radio airplay and interest began to take shape in Halifax. In early 1993, the band (consisting of Mark Gaudet on drums, Chris Thompson on guitar, Julie Doiron on bass/vocals and Rick White on guitar/vocals) released the EP, Peter on Sloan's Murder Records. Interest in Sloan lead to subsequent interest in E.T., and the group eventually signed to Seattle's Sub-Pop Records in early summer of 1993, which led to the subsequent release of Songs for Chris.

The forthcoming album, Love Tara, sees the band diverge to a less harsh and more acoustic-based sound. Not to fear, it comes off well. While not a punk band, E.T., by refusing to use a studio, does personify the "Do-It-Yourself" spirit that punk began in 1976. The music is underproduced in all its beautiful raw glory. This is something that other bands should start trying, instead of trying to be the latest Pearl Jam rip-off (which isn't a good thing in itself). I jumped at the chance to interview guitarist Chris Thompson, who was both friendly and polite; it made the interview much easier than those musical tyrants, Los Seamonsters (arf! arf!).

Queen's Journal: Despite being a band from Moncton, how does it feel to be lumped into the whole Halifax (although I hate to use the term) scene?

Chris Thompson: It's kinda weird, 'cause Moncton's totally different than Halifax. In Halifax the bands seem to be sociable, more naive or something...it's really weird.

QJ: Are there a lot of bands coming out of Moncton these days?
CT: There's a lot of bands, not very many of them are getting recognized right now. A lot of bands are putting out seven-inches now, so hopefully things will be happening.

QJ: What are your particular favourite bands, Canadian or otherwise?

CT: My favourite Canadian band these days would be Grasshopper from Toronto. We're actually doing some dates with them this time when we go out. Favourite bands would be Sebadoh, the early Dinosaur Jr. when they were still just Dinosaur, Neil Young and Red Kross for sure.

QJ: For myself, I would describe Eric's Trip as a cross between My Bloody Valentine and Sonic Youth with the acoustic guitar mixed in. How do you respond to this?

CT: Rick and Julie are heavily influenced by MBV. We're not really influenced by Sonic Youth other than we took the name from one of their songs. [Of the brilliant 1988 release Day Dream Nation.]

QJ: As far as signing to Sub-Pop, I read that you initially rejected their offer and then accepted it?

CT: We just weren't sure that we were ready to be on a label. We wanted to stay independent but the second offer was something that we couldn't pass up. When you have world-wide distribution of your music...that's great!

QJ: Do you feel comfortable now being on a major-indie label?

CT: Yes now, 'cause they're signing bands that are more along our lines. Before they had Nirvana and Mudhoney, now bands like Velocity Girl, Sebadoh and punk bands like the Fast Backs are being signed. It's great!

QJ: On being the first Canadian

Blur
Modern Life Is Rubbish
Food Records/EMI
BY RYAN P. CHEN
The Queen's Journal

The relationship between a CD and its cover is usually an arbitrary one. Consider the cover of Blur's 1991 debut release, Leisure: it features the face of a waifish model wearing a floral bathing cap. Although the picture is certainly attractive (and it ranks among my favourites), it doesn't seem to say anything about the songs on the disc. But while the cover of Leisure seems wholly irrelevant, the cover of Blur's much anticipated follow-up, Modern Life Is Rubbish, is significant in every respect. Depicting a modernized steam engine speeding against a storm-threatening sky, the painting subtly conveys the CD's conceptual meaning and musical flavour.

The train image suggests the idea of travel, and the material on Modern Life Is Rubbish arises out of the experiences from Blur's recent visit to North America. During their exhausting two month tour, Blur (and especially vocalist Damon Albarn) became overwhelmed by the monotony of American culture. Pining for home, Blur began an introspective journey into their English consciousness.

As Damon states, "We wanted to write something with a very definite sense of place, populated by very definite characters and something that would try to encapsulate modern England..."

This desire has subsequently led Blur to re-work their sound. Not content to merely sing songs about England, they are now obsessed with the idea of sounding English as well. Thus, Blur has forsaken the style which originally propelled them into the limelight—the dancey electro-pop of "There's No Other Way" and the psychedelic feel of "She's So High" — in favour of a mood reminiscent of the Sixties British Invasion (such as The Kinks, The Beatles, and David Bowie) coupled with the punk spirit of The Sex Pistols and The Jam.

The musical shift made executives at Food Records extremely uneasy. As Damon recalls in the April 10th issue of New Musical Express, "Everyone [at Food Records] was getting really nervous, because record companies follow fashion..." Perhaps the big-wigs failed to catch the irony in "Bang," when Damon cried out, Everybody is doing it, so do it too. The image of a train seems to express Blur's frustration with the current state of the music industry. Like the train, the course of music nowadays is determined by the demands of business executives who rarely veer off the monotonous, well travelled lines which lead to commercial success.

However, according to Damon, this phenomenon is only a symptom of a larger societal problem. "Modern life is rubbish of the past," he explains. "We all live on the rubbish...there's no necessity for originality any more. There are so many old things to splice together in infinite permutations that there is absolutely no need to create anything new."

Blur could be accused of falling into the very trap which Damon so zealously condemns. After all, isn't their new sound (and look) just a smorgasbord of material appropriated from mods and punks? Again, we can look at the CD cover for an explanation for Blur's revisionist slant. As mentioned previously, the locomotive is steam powered, but it also has a modern appearance. The image, therefore, conveys the idea of refurbishing something from the past and making it relevant for the present — which is exactly what Blur accomplishes.

Although their sound may be retro, Blur's sentiments (as their lead-off single, "For Tomorrow," indicates) are certainly grounded in contemporary, and even futuristic, concerns. And while Blur are preoccupied with Englishness, Modern Life Is Rubbish doesn't celebrate their homeland. Indeed, Damon unapologetically states, "A lot of [this album] is triggered by things which are quite sinister, things tied up with the Americanization of this country."

Such attitudes are expressed throughout the release, but they seem to coalesce in "Sunday Sunday," a two and half minute Kinkish pop song featuring a back-up horn section and anguished lyrics like You meet an old soldier and talk of the past / He fought for us in two world wars and says the England he knew is no more.

Modern Life Is Rubbish doesn't openly attempt to answer the questions which "Sunday Sunday" begs: why and how has England changed? Admittedly, Blur can be criticized for this omission.

But to paraphrase Billy Bragg, "Just because you don't have the answers to political questions, it shouldn't negate your responsibility to talk about them."

Blur focus on the consequences of, rather than on the solutions to, the issues which they raise. Tracks like "Blue Jeans" and "Coping" are emotional responses to the dreariness of urban life, which they describe in the frenetic three minutes of "Colin Zeal." With their catchy, easy-to-identify-with (and characteristically ironic) choruses — I don't really want to change a thing / I want to stay this way forever; But I'm too tired to care about it / Can't you see it in my face? — "Blue Jeans" and "Coping" successfully induce a cathartic response.

Modern Life Is Rubbish is thoroughly Anglocentric, but its title belies the CD's relevance to all industrial countries of the West. They merely use examples from English life to talk about modern life in general — about the decline of England with the advent of American pop culture. Once more, the cover indicates the universality of the CD's themes. Neither the landscape nor the train look particularly English. The painting could depict a scene anywhere in the West, from the American Mid-West to the industrial heartland of Germany.

Even Eastern Ontario for that matter.

So there you have it. That was One, not according to me, but according to you. And I certainly couldn't have said it any better myself.

Making highs and lows middle of the road

Mr. Jones
Directed by Mike Figgis
Cataract Cineplex
BY TARA LYNN KEATS
The Queen's Journal

"You're an interesting man, Mr. Jones."
- Dr. Libbie Bowen

"But you want to make me ordinary."
- Mr. Jones

Oh no, you groan, not another movie where a psychiatrist crosses the bounds of his/her professional trust and falls in love with his/her patient. And oh no, not another one starring Richard Gere (remember Final Analysis?). Well, oh yes, Mr. Jones is just that. But don't worry, because Barbara "I'll Give Hollywood a Guilt Trip for Not Giving Me an Oscar for Prince of Tides" Streisand isn't in this one.

Mr. Jones begins by introducing Dr. Libbie Bowen, a talented psychotherapist who is recently divorced and lives alone with her cat and her psych books. Lena Olin (Enemies, A Love Story) plays the good doctor who is trying to heal her unstable patients while dealing with the fact that her ex-husband is seeing a woman half his age.

Then we meet Richard Gere's character, Mr. Jones, who at first glance appears to be simply a guy brimming with energy and love of life. He's a loud, extroverted, generous man, and a compulsive shopper. Mr. Jones (like Columbo and MacGyver, we never find out his first name) dances around, hands out hundred dollar bills like Halloween candy, and buys baby grand pianos at the drop of a hat - all to the strains of James Brown's "I

We learn that Mr. Jones is not just an eccentric guy, but that he suffers from manic depression, a mental condition which causes him to go through cycles of emotional extremes from euphoria to severe depression.

The film launches into a dramatic discourse on mental disorwhich are also inhibited by the drug. Despite this fundamental disagreement, Mr. Jones and Libbie fall in love.

What is really commendable about Mr. Jones is its refreshing depiction of the mentally ill. Several vignettes of mentally ill patients are shown, and although is very convincing in both the manic and depressive states of his character. Gere lets his hair down, proving that he can be funny - you have to see him sing "I Feel Good" and do what resembles the chicken dance. Director Figgis clearly can bring out the best in the actor, as evidenced by their previous collaboration, the thriller Internal Affairs. Lena Olin, by comparison, is uninspired; she is too aloof to convince anyone of her undying love for her patient.

Despite Gere's performance and the refreshing depiction of mental disorders, the film does not deliver the emotional punches it could have. The romantic storyline is underdeveloped and there is a decided lack of chemistry between Gere and Olin. Witnessing the funny stunts that Mr. Jones pulls in his manic state - like kissing a strange girl on the street and then running away from her angry boyfriend - is a lot more interesting than following his relationship with Dr. Bowen.

Film-makers should realize by now that psychiatrists falling in love with their patients is cliché. The plot of Mr. Jones is indeed tired, though fans of Richard Gere, desiring more than awards show consciousness raising about Tibet, may still be tempted.

Got You (I Feel Good)." Mr. Jones's grandiose personality gets him in trouble, however, as he literally tries to fly off a roof while on the job at a construction site. This stunt lands him in the Mar Vista State Hospital, the psychiatric institution where Dr. Bowen just happens to practise.

many of the patients' actions seem humorous, they are not exposed to the camera in a comedic or mocking light. They are treated with humanity and compassion, and for this director Mike Figgis deserves credit.

Richard Gere also merits praise for his performance in the film. He Richard Gere and Lena Olin demonstrate a hot new therapy technique.

Shuffle off to Buffalo

Buffalo Tom
Big Red Letter Day
Beggar's Banquet/PolyGram
BY STEVE CAIN
The Queen's Journal

Q: The new Buffalo Tom?
A: A whole lotta "Larry" and a lot less J.

For those who haven't been fans of this Boston trio from the start - beginning with 1989's fabulous eponymous release - the above merely succinctly explains the musical style that Buffalo Tom have been moving towards in the last few years: a more acoustic sound (typified by "Larry" from '91's Let Me Come Over) rather than the white-noise and feedback that was present on Buffalo Tom and Birdbrain (thanks in part to production by J Mascis).

While initially the Mascis connection was as much a hindrance to success as it helped (critics calling them Dinosaur Jr. Jr., even on the earlier releases songs like "The Bus" or "Fortune Teller" one could tell that Tom Janovitz and Chris Colburn (as songwriters) were striving for more than fodder for the mosh pit.

Let Me Come Over was the first step towards a modification of sound, a lushly textured album that, although still using electric guitars, showed more melody - and maturity - than ever before. Some fans shouted: sell-out. But hey, they didn't have that many in the first place, so the ones they might have lost were more than made up for the ones they gained from tunes like "Velvet Roof" and "Mineral."

Now with Big Red Letter Day the gang have taken the next logical jump - turning off the electricity and stripping down the sound. That's not to say that the new album is any less angst-ridden or musically powerful - it's just now that the emphasis is on the vocals and song structure to carry the disenfranchised emotion, rather than feedback and gonzo drumming.

The lead single, "Soda Jerk," is a good example of the "new" sort of sound. Relying mainly on the strum-and-drum combo to carry the tune, Janovitz sings in a series of peaks and waves with Colburn echoing his lines (the way Stipe and Mills of R.E.M. work, for example). The song moves through various melodic epiphanies always succeeding because they inevitably chose the chords that fit perfectly - but are unexpected to the average listener.

Other songs are jauntier, such as "Treehouse," a song that makes best use of Tom Maginnis's unorthodox drumming style (originally a guitar player, he performs as if the drums were a lead instrument, rather than just a group's metronome). A catchy, rocking effort, it's the kind of song that Kingston's Reckoning would have chosen to cover if they were still around. Similarly, "Torch Song," with its pleasant and tuneful style which bursts into melodious bridges stands alongside "Treehouse" favourably.

The aforementioned emphasis on vocal hooks over guitar riffs, can be found on "Anything That Way," the moving piece that closes the album, as well as on "Would Not Be Denied" and the Colburn-penned, "Late At Night." But Buffalo Tom are still, to some extent (to use the words of the godlike-king-of-coolness music critic, the Toronto Star's Lenny Stoute [Ed's note: irony]) "the sons of J Mascis." The song "Dry Land" opens with the licks to Dino Jr.'s "Freak Scene," while "Latest Monkey" is heavisided in a Mascis tradition.

I'd like to mention how great the lyrics on Big Red Letter Day (as on all Buffalo Tom albums) are, but, as usual with these guys, reprinting them seems futile. To write, The moon was full of your whisky sour, there was no need for you to be so dour, sounds true in print and gives no justice to life way that Janovitz sings them. Similarly, great songs about disillusionment with drugs, drink and the whole twenty-something anxiety such as "I'm Allowed" merely come out like come to the party! but I got my own signals crossed! thought I was welcomed but I felt like getting lost. I guess the argument that lyrics are not poetry may be true, although both Colburn and Janovitz read poetry regularly and the latter has studied creative writing. The pure poetry only comes through with the intonation, breath marks and singing.

Other than that, disappointments are few, the main one being the running time. The length of the Big Red Letter Day is quite a bit shorter than the last release, which either prompts me to think that the band was short of material or else were rushed. Maybe they're saving any extra tracks for EPs (the bane of every music fan's pocketbook).

Big Red Letter Day is a very different album from Buffalo Tom's earlier efforts, and even a distance from Let Me Come Over. It's a mature effort and one that I think people will look back upon and see that it was head and shoulders above the other alternate music being produced in the early 1990s. In other words, it will still be considered great when the nose holes grow in, flannels become leisure suits and Pearl Jam fans pass pubescence.

I am Bjork, hear me roar

Bjork Debut
BY SIAN BEDDOE-STEPHENS
The Queen's Journal

Bjork has one of the most amazing voices I have ever heard. The pixie-ish singer has an odd, childish sensuality about her; she's been compared to everything from a purring cat to a screaming diva. Nevertheless, however inconsistently she may be described, there remains an inexplicable, awe-inspiring aura about her.

We first heard Bjork's wails when she fronted the Sugarcubes' raw, guitar-driven sound. Most recently, Bjork has taken time off from the Cubes to attend to her own sound. Debut is her appropriately titled first release as a solo artist.

Debut expands Bjork's oddity one step further. Unlike the Sugarcubes, her solo album is a multi-flavoured combination of pop, dance, jazz and a funky Icelandic version of soul. Surprisingly, Bjork chose Nellee Hopper (Soul II Soul) to produce Debut. The result is some interesting experimentation.

The album alternates between varying types of styles. In songs like "Crying," "Big-Time Sensuality," and "Violently Happy," Bjork sings with a heavy dance beat. As unappetizing as this combination may appear to loyal Sugarcubes fans, the programmed beat does not threaten or challenge the power of Bjork's voice. On the contrary, the result is surprisingly good; Bjork's energy is playfully well-suited.

However, the whole album is far from being entirely dance songs. "Come to Me" and "Venus As a Boy" are airy and hypnotic, while "The Aeroplane" and "The Anchor Song" are strange and cacophonous with honking saxophones. Bjork also does a soppy, Disney-ish soundtrack cover of the standard "Like Someone In Love," complete with the sole accompaniment of a harp. As much as I like Bjork I can't help but hate "Like Someone In Love"; it's too painfully beautiful and romantic - she needs to do one long wail in the middle of the many harp solos to redeem the song's otherwise overwhelming purity.

My final complaint is with Debut's closing song, "The Anchor Song." The previous song, "Violently Happy," is arguably one of the best songs of the album. However, after bopping around to "Violently Happy," the abrasive saxophone bleatings of "The Anchor Song" end the album on a truly foul note.

I have a love/hate opinion of Debut; I'm not sure about how glad I am that she went crazy with her experimentation. Although some songs are easy to recognize as great, the album in its entirety is questionable.

No Easy Cure

The Cure Show Elektra/Fiction BY ROB FURSE The Queen's Journal

For well over a decade The Cure have been the leading purveyors of teenage angst and goth-rock. From 1980's seminal 17 Seconds to 1989's Disintegration, The Cure have spawned legions of imitators from The Mission to Sisters of Mercy.

Now in their sixteenth year of existence, with a fully consecrated and growing following, the band is big business. According to Details, from 1990 through 1992 the band sold ten millions dollars worth of merchandise - more than INXS and R.E.M. combined. Yet despite the band's marketing prowess, they have released precious little musical product apart from their ten original studio releases. There was 1990's Mixed Up and of course 1986's commercial breakthrough Standing on a Beach - The Singles, but the only official live recording of The Cure was 1984's Concert - The Cure Live. To redress both this paucity of musical product and live recordings, The Cure now offers us two live CD's - Show and Paris (due for release later this month) as well as the concert video Show. That this triumvirate will triumph commercially is a non-issue, but considering that Show is essentially a live documentation of The Cure's saccharine tinged Wish with some old hits thrown in, artistic integrity is less assured.

In fact eight of the CD's fourteen tracks are taken from Wish; highlights of these selections include last year's single "Friday I'm in Love" and "Doing the Unstuck," two songs firmly entrenched in The Cure's frivolous pop music tradition. And although these two songs come alive during the live performance, The Cure possesses far superior "pop" songs from previous albums that follow in the pop-for-pop's sake tradition begun by "Boys Don't Cry" and "The Love Cats."

The Door is perhaps the best representation of the introspective and brooding perspective for which The Cure are best known. A darkly melodic track, it captures the existential angst which is such an integral part of Robert Smith's persona.

On the other hand The Cure's current tendency towards lightweight material may be for the better, as the last track of Show is "End," an alienating sub-standard extraction from Wish.

The CD is rounded out by singles such as "Just Like Heaven" and "Lullaby" and these non-Wish selections ultimately redeem the CD by providing a bridge of live music from Concert - The Cure

Live to the present. The only other live renditions of these songs are found on the concert video The Cure in Orange which is not available as a soundtrack.

Paris, with its inclusion of more obscure selections such as "Charlotte Sometimes" and "Let's Go to Bed," as well as major hits such as "Lovesong," should help fill in the gaps left by Show. But if the truth be told this double CD release could have just as easily been pared down to one CD (containing the best of The Cure's last eight years) instead of being padded with extraneous selections from Wish, a sub-standard release by the band's standards.

band signed to Sub-Pop, can you see Sub-Pop going out and signing more Canadian bands?

CT: Actually they're looking at a few. They signed Jale last May but they're not doing an album until the fall of 1994. They're still in development right now, still learning a lot of the business. Heart Shaped Post, is going to do a seven-inch with them... that might lead to something else.

QJ: How did you get to know Sloan and how did you association with them lead to the release of the Never Mind the Molluscs?

CT: We knew them before the big Geffen thing, even before they had an offer from Netwerk. It was during our first show in Halifax that Chris and Andrew came and saw us play. They were totally blown away by us I guess... people said after they saw us they changed their sound a lot. So hopefully we influenced them a little bit [laughing], but everybody takes a bit from everybody else anyway.

QJ: As far as using male and female vocalists in E.T., is that trying to defy the whole male/macho rock star image?

CT: Macho for sure. If you haven't seen us we're all really small people. I guess Rick and Julie's voice sound really nice together, like Belinda and Kevin in MBV. I don't know... it just works out.

QJ: Was the new album like Peter and Songs For Chris recorded on a 4-track or in a studio?

CT: It was done in our houses. Four songs were done on 4-track and the rest on an 8-track. So we went one step further, but it's all done ourselves.

QJ: Have you tried a studio or don't you like working in one?

CT: Never Mind The Molluscs was done in the studio. [It] sounds like it wasn't but that's just the way we turn out. [When we record in a studio] we don't have any control over what's going on, we're not allowed to touch anything. We have someone mixing for us, turning all the dials... it's not very fun. If we had a 24-track in our basements we'd use it. It's just easier for us to do it on 8-track and take all the time we need. You shouldn't have to pay somebody, it keeps the money from you.

QJ: Who would be your ideal touring band?

CT: We just toured with Redd Kross in Europe and they're the greatest people... it was amazing. The tour was great, there was enough people 'cause Redd Kross are really big over there... enough people came to see us.

QJ: Now to close things off with, how are things going in general with the band?

CT: So far everything's going well. We don't have any money. Other than that nothing bad has happened... yet. Still living at home with Mom.

The cougar grows tame

John Mellencamp Human Wheels PolyGram Records BY BROCK MARTLAND The Queen's Journal

John Mellencamp. Formerly John Cougar. As in "Jack and Diane" and other juvenile tunes from grade school. But wait - this is a different man. He's matured considerably. Gone are the predictable lyrics, the simple riff-based songs, and that annoying "rebel" attitude.

You probably heard "What If I Came Knockin'" on the radio over the summer, and may have thought the hasn't changed. But that song is about the weakest one on the new album. Human Wheels successfully combines the best elements of Mellencamp's old efforts - the guitar raunchiness of Whenever We Wanted, the catchiness of The Lonesome Jubilee, and the fullness of Scarecrow.

This album is easily his most mature effort. It may not be his best album (I'd award that title to Whenever We Wanted from two years back), but it shows that Mellencamp has finally learned the fine art of self-restraint. The same restraint that makes someone like Van Morrison better than Meatloaf.

My initial favourite on the album is "When Jesus Left Birmingham." It's unlike any previous Mellencamp tune, making use of (almost) a dance-beat. But unlike 12, Mellencamp keeps to his roots, balancing the repetitiousness of the song with a strong and tuneful chorus.

In fact, he seems to acknowledge the immaturity of his early tunes, as he sings the same lyrics here as in "Jack and Diane": Let it rock, let it roll, let the bible belt come and save my soul. The backup singing is outstanding on this tune, giving it the feel of a gospel church in the Deep South. Which is appropriate given that the song is about finding salvation in Alabama.

Many of the songs on Human Wheels deal with Mellencamp's typical concerns - life in the U.S., ageing, crime, family, and idealism. He often adopts a voice to make a point, as in "Junior" when he sings, as one who sees "the world through a TV guide" and admits: What a small little man I am, to show the futility of life for many Americans.

Similarly, Human Wheels expresses great bitterness about the U.S., as Mellencamp questions the American dream as eloquently as he ever has: This frail reminder of its giant, dreaming self. The video may seem a little pretentious (he still tends to play to an image on film), but this song likely represents the best lyricism of any Mellencamp effort to date.

The production on this album is first-rate. While Whenever We Wanted brought the guitar work up front, Canadian producer Malcolm Burn has levelled out the mix. If anything is buried it is the lead vocals. But this has more to do with Mellencamp's singing style. Like Mick Jagger on Exile on Main Street (or Michael Stipe on the first few R.E.M. albums), Mellencamp deliberately mumbles his words. This makes for a refreshing change - no more over-eager shouting, but rather a subtlety that previous albums have lacked. The singing suits the material too; most of the songs are reflective and even frustrated, and so are well served by a "reluctant" singing style.

A first hearing of the album may not leave you converted. Many of the songs are sleepers - you slip into their groove only after hearing the disk a few times. But the laid-back groove of "Beige to Beige," the almost-oriental melody of "To the River," and the tense, uneasy chorus of "Sweet Evening Breeze" ought to win over converts.

Human Wheels is a very mature work. In some respects it reminds me of the Tragically Hip's Fully, Completely - a more mellow album following a straight-ahead rock record, released (appropriately) in the fall, and offering new and surprising insights, as well as great rock music.

Getting didactic about prophylactics

The condom, a.k.a. rubber, raincoat, jimmy-hat, and other cute euphemisms, is the safest, most economical and most readily available method of birth control. It's also the second-best protection against STDs (the best protection is the patented Donna Martin from 90210 method, abstinence). More vital than a shag tape, and cheaper too, especially if you get them at the Birth Control Centre. We offer this piece of advice to those men who don't like using them: you'll live (and last) longer!

There are many services at Queen's which are offered by students for students, but how many of those are well known? The Grey House is home to several of these groups: the Birth Control Centre, the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Association, the Women's Centre, Ontario Public Interest Research Group, Unified Student Environmental Network, and the Queen's Christian Fellowship. Last year the Grey House was made "non-opt-outable", meaning that all undergraduates pay fees which go towards the operation of these services. They use your money; you would do well to put these services to good use.

The Birth Control Centre is perhaps one of the best kept secrets on campus — when it shouldn't be! The BCC gives out valuable information on STDs, safe sex, birth control methods, as well as selling contraceptives.

The following statistics were compiled by the BCC over the past two years:

- Number of female clients in 1991-92: 1413
- Number of male clients in 1991-92: 520
- Number of female clients in 1992-93: 1675
- Number of male clients in 1992-93: 789
- People who asked questions about birth control in 1991-92: 510
- People who asked questions about pregnancy options in 1991-92: 331
- People who asked questions about AIDS or other STDs in 1991-92: 134
- People who asked questions about AIDS or other STDs in 1992-93: 172
- People who also wanted to purchase products in 1991-92: 548
- People who also wanted to purchase products in 1992-93: 843
- Number of requests for teach-ins in 1991-92: 31
- Number of requests for teach-ins in 1992-93: 39
- Increase in number of clients from 1991-92 to 1992-93: 27.5%

condoms: lubricated, non-lubricated, lubricated with nonoxynol-9

Perhaps the most commonly used birth control device in use, the condom is a latex sheath which covers the penis. Roll them on as if they were socks; don't unroll them and try to put it on like a pair of pants. Be sure to squeeze the air out of the receptacle at the tip as this gives a place for the semen to collect. The condom is 98% reliable if used properly, but in general, effectiveness is around 88%. Condoms are the most effective way of preventing the contraction or transmission of STDs or AIDS.

If the condom breaks, you should either insert some spermicide into the vagina immediately or use the "morning-after pill".

contraceptive foam: with or without applicator

Spermicides immobilize or kill sperm. Foam and jelly can have as high as 95% effectiveness in preventing pregnancy, but for the average user, the effectiveness is about 79%. Foam can be inserted up to 20 minutes before intercourse. Load the applicator just before use. Shake the bottle of foam very well and gently press the applicator on the nozzle. Insert the applicator into the vagina as far as possible (or until it reaches the cervix). Withdraw the applicator half an inch and push the plunger to release the foam. An additional application of foam is necessary for each act of coitus. Wash the applicator in soapy water. This method does not prevent the transmission of STDs.

contraceptive jelly: with or without applicator

To use spermicidal jelly, screw the applicator onto the tube to fill it. Follow the instructions specific to the product. Like foam, this does not prevent the transmission of STDs.

contraceptive sponge

Wet the sponge with tap water and squeeze it a few times to make it sudsy. Inset it into the vagina, dimple side first and push it up to the cervix. Slide your finger around the edge to make sure the cervix is covered. You can have intercourse within the next 24 hours, leaving the sponge in place for at least six hours after the last ejaculation. Does not prevent the transmission of STDs.

dental dams

Dental dams are sheets of latex used to prevent the transmission of STDs during oral sex. Hold the dam between your thumbs and forefingers, and proceed as you normally would.

Advice for lesbians

Many lesbians have felt themselves immune to STDs (especially AIDS) because of the nature of their sexual contact. To quote Susie Bright in Sexual Reality: A Virtual Sex Reader:

"It's simply not true that lesbians are not personally affected and infected by the AIDS virus... One woman whispered to me in a Canadian prairie town two years ago is something I can hear any day of the week now: "I am losing girlfriends to AIDS."

Dental dams are apparently not tested as rigorously as condoms and can have tiny perforations which can permit the transmission of STDs. Some have recommended the use of condoms cut up the side instead of dental dams.

Advice for gay men

The gay community has been one of the hardest hit by AIDS. Always use a condom for any kind of intercourse, even when only engaging in oral sex. Current thinking dictates that foreplay and "outercourse" are to be considered safe; essentially anything that doesn't involve bodily fluids. Anal intercourse still carries risks as the condom can come off or break. You can either "double bag" (wear one condom over another) or order reinforced condoms.

If you're sexually active, going to the Birth Control Centre and finding out about your options, safe-sex and purchasing contraception could be the smartest decision you make this year. The contraceptive devices are sold at cost (roughly two-thirds off retail). You can use the money you save to buy cassettes for shag tapes!

CELEBRITY Recipes

Queen's: land of swimming pools, movie stars & students.

We at the Back Page have often been asked: "Hey, I'm trying to impress someone with a home-cooked meal — do you have a good dessert recipe?" For you, we present:

- Deep-fried ice cream
- Ingredients:
- French vanilla ice cream
 - 1 cup corn flakes
 - 1/2 cup shredded coconut
 - 1/2 cup oatmeal
 - 4 egg whites
 - 1/2 cup sugar
 - Melted chocolate

Mold the ice cream into "tennis balls" and place them in the freezer. In a food processor, combine coconut, oatmeal and cornflakes and grind them coarsely. Put aside in a bowl. Beat the egg whites until fluffy. Add sugar, and beat until frothy (this mixture is called meringue in the business). Roll the ice cream balls in the meringue and then roll them in the coconut/corn flake/oatmeal mixture. Pack the ice cream balls tightly and place them in the freezer for a few hours. When you're ready to serve them, submerge the ice cream in hot oil for about 20 seconds (this is easier with a deep fryer). Remove and cover with melted chocolate.

A kinder, gentler homecoming

BY PAUL ZIMBALATTI
The Queen's Journal

Queen's Alumni Weekend '93 will be a celebration of over a century and a half of tradition. However, one tradition that the Alumni Weekend Review Board would rather do without is street-partying.

At an alumni weekend media conference held Wednesday, organizers emphasized that the weekend's events are focused on avoiding the tradition of street-partying, which the City of Kingston considers intolerable.

Homecoming this year will feature not only Queen's alumni and the Kill McGill football game, but also the 100th anniversary of the Faculty of Applied Science at Queen's.

As always, homecoming will supply a substantial financial boost to the Kingston area.

"You can't get a room with a shoehorn and most restaurants have heavy bookings," reported Alumni Weekend coordinator Tammy Young.

The 3,000 alumni registered for the weekend are conservatively predicted to spend over half a million dollars in the Kingston area, according to senior tourism officer Paula Nichols.

"We're using various campus media to get the message out that the focus is on alumni," said Nancy Millham of the Alumni Weekend Review Board. "We encourage students to participate but not forget that we have neighbours that are very important to us," she said.

Bryan McKenzie, who chairs the Alumni Weekend committee in the Alma Mater Society, said, "our focus is on giving people fun things to do without booze."

Tatham agrees. "It's very important to us that Queen's neighbours are not disrupted and that they can carry on with their day-to-day lives," she said.

On Sunday morning, a crew of volunteers will clean up the debris in the student housing area. "We're getting as many people together as we can," said McKenzie. "It's only fair to our neighbours to keep our neighbourhoods clean."

In addition, a hotline will be open on the weekend to handle any complaints from the community.

Sensitivity to the community has been a priority of Alumni Weekend organizers in recent years, after the homecoming celebrations got out of hand in the 1980's, said Tatham.

"In the mid-80's, we had some bad attitude going on, we had some bad problems going on," said Tatham.

In 1987, these problems were so severe that the Oct. 19, 1987 issue of the Whig-Standard reported

Surface to be put to final vote

BY KAREN HALL
The Queen's Journal

All Arts and Science students will have an opportunity to speak out and vote on the future funding of Surface at a Special General Meeting of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Nov. 4.

The paper, meant to give a voice to minority viewpoints on campus, was the subject of an ASUS referendum last week. It has been criticized by some for printing controversial articles and poems over the past few years.

The referendum question, which asked students to support the funding of Surface, was defeated, with 55.6 per cent voting against it.

"If the students vote against funding Surface [at the Nov. 4 meeting], that's it" for ASUS funding the paper, said ASUS President Jenn Steeves at a press conference Oct. 19. "All previous motions regarding Surface funding will be void," she said.

At the meeting, which will be held in lower Victoria Hall, students will vote on whether the referendum should be binding. Should the motion pass, Steeves said, all future referendums will be considered to be binding. Presently, Steeves said, the constitution does not say how Assembly must act in response to a referendum.

"This is a question that needs to be asked," Steeves said. She added that ASUS is faced with a motion from a previous meeting that is contradictory to the outcome of the referendum.

"I think the referendum should be binding on Assembly," Steeves said. "Students have voted in the referendum and I have to act according to it," she said.

The executive would not comment on their plans if the motions fail to pass, and said that further information will be available at a press conference Nov. 8.

"The meeting on Nov. 4 is the students' opportunity to voice their views," Steeves explained. "All Arts and Science students will have a vote and a right to speak at the meeting."

Steeves reminded students to bring their student cards to the meeting, as voting will take place at

MCRC asks for inclusion

BY TANIS ROBINSON
The Queen's Journal

Warren Flannery, president of the Main Campus Residence Council, is irritated after MCRC was left out of a new sexual harassment committee formed by the Residence Life Office.

The Queen's Residences Sexual Misconduct Complaint Procedure Committee, formed two years ago by the Residence Life Office, submitted a draft for their new policy to MCRC last March. The policy concerns the procedure of reporting sexual misconduct.

MCRC President Warren Flannery immediately wrote back, outlining the changes he wanted to see made to the draft.

"Although we realize that there has been a history of poor communications between our organization and the Residence Life Office, we wish to change this," wrote Flannery.

"We didn't hear back from the committee until this September," he said, "and it didn't address any of our concerns." He added that MCRC would not support the new policy until the changes had been implemented.

According to Flannery, one of the changes demanded by MCRC was that all incidents be reported to the MCRC Vice-President of Discipline, Justine Amaro.

In his letter to Dr. Graham Brown, director of residences and chair of the Sexual Misconduct Committee, Flannery wrote: "We feel that it is important that the VP is informed about incidents and their resolutions, in order that the safety and security of all residents not be compromised."

The draft outlines four possible channels for students to follow in reporting sexual misconduct. These are the Kingston Police Department, the Office of the Director of Residences, the Queen's University Sexual Harassment Complaint Procedure, and the Alma Mater Society Judicial Prosecutor.

Flannery said he wants to see the MCRC Discipline System

Sunera Thobani discusses globalization on Tuesday night.

NAC leader speaks at Queen's

Thobani calls need for women's movement stronger than ever

BY KRISTEN KUNNAS
The Queen's Journal

On Tuesday night, Sunera Thobani addressed a capacity crowd at Grant Hall concerning the issue of "Globalization: Race and Gender in the 90's."

Thobani is the director of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. NAC is a collective organization which addresses women's issues, especially equality rights. But don't mistake it for a special interest group, said Thobani.

"A group representing 52 per cent of the population and fighting for equality rights is not a special interest group," she said.

Thobani remarked that the feminist movement is "a movement for the equality rights of all women." But because she also believes that we "live in a society divided along lines of race at every level," she emphasized the need for marginalized women to have a strong voice in defining the priorities of the women's movement.

"We have to stop dividing women. We have to acknowledge that differences exist and build alliances that are real. With a conscious effort we can take on these issues to make us collectively stronger," Thobani reflected.

And with the federal election less than a week away, Thobani stressed that "we need a much deeper understanding of political parties, what their policies are, and what they mean for Canadian women today."

Concerning globalization, Thobani commented that "it is being touted as if it is a new discovery. A global economy has existed for 500 years - since the first Europeans landed in North America."

She said that although global markets create inequalities, the Progressive Conservatives want to leave the markets alone. "We need to challenge the idea that economics, if left to itself, will create equality," Thobani said.

She criticized Kim Campbell for appointing less women to the federal cabinet than Brian Mulroney did. Concerning Campbell's decision to put Immigration under the portfolio of Public Security, Thobani said, "she has defined immigration as a threat [to Canada]."

Thobani called the Reform Party "the most serious political threat to women and minority rights," saying that the party's mandate is to cut social programs. As a result, she said, equality-seeking groups have no role to play within the Reform Party.

"We need to address where this backlash which targets minorities comes from," said Thobani, "for it will undermine women's autonomy and ability to participate in society."

Social programs are important to Thobani for she believes they support equality rights for women. "Social programs mean a recognition that the Canadian government has an absolute commitment to equality and rights - rights that everyone should have access to," she said.

"We are being told that these are only economic choices. Yet where cuts are made to social programs, it is not just an economic choice. These are political choices and depend on the political priorities of the parties," said Thobani.

And without these programs, Thobani noted, life will be very difficult for women across the country. If spending for women's shelters is cut, she said, it will put educational issues on the federal election agenda.

The Vote Education campaign was cooked up at a meeting of student government members in Saskatoon in the summer, and over 22 colleges and universities took part, representing over 300,000 students across the country. It was non-partisan, and aimed to put educational issues on the federal election agenda.

The Queen's Alma Mater Society coordinated the Ontario leg of the campaign, which included transit ads in Ottawa, Toronto and Kingston, as well as a radio spot on local rock station CIZ-FM.

"Survey says..."

Vote Education campaign results are in - but many candidates didn't bother to respond, including Milliken, McAdam

BY JEFF GRAY
The Queen's Journal

The Vote Education campaign surveys are back, and the candidates running in the federal election who actually responded have put their thoughts on educational issues on the record.

Just 28 candidates in Ontario filled out the survey themselves, though many submitted official party answers. In all, the survey received 62 responses.

Local candidates from whom no responses at all were received include the Reform Party's Sean McAdam and Liberal incumbent Peter Milliken.

Taz Pirmohamed, the academic affairs commissioner for the AMS and coordinator of the campaign, said she was happy with the survey's results.

"I'm pleased that we did get the response that we did, and I'm pleased that the parties' headquarters took the survey seriously and came up with official responses," Pirmohamed said.

However, she did admit she was surprised that so many candidates didn't respond.

"I was disappointed because I think every individual should be educated on these issues," Pirmohamed said.

She said the AMS went so far as to meet with Milliken, discuss the issues on the survey with him, and then left him the survey to fill out and return.

As of press time, Pirmohamed said they had yet to hear from him.

Many Reform candidates, including McAdam, sent a letter to Pirmohamed stating that "we have decided that in the interest of maintaining some distance between our party and public interest advocacy groups, we will be unable to respond to such questionnaires."

Included with the letter was a Reform Party pamphlet, which said "little or nothing about education," commented Pirmohamed.

The New Democrats came out with the most candidates responding to the survey, with 23 out of the 52 candidates the party is fielding in Ontario submitting responses.

That's compared to 10 Liberal responses, 12 Conservative and three Reform.

Kingston and the Islands NDP candidate Mary Ann Higgs filled out the survey herself, as well as Progressive Conservative Barry Gordon, Pirmohamed said.

The National Party and the Natural Law Party did not respond to requests for candidate address lists, and so their candidates were not included in the survey.

Local National Party candidate Chris Papadopoulos did manage to get a copy of the survey and respond, however.

"It's good that we have these surveys on the record now," Pirmohamed said. The surveys will be sent to every school in Ontario who took part, she added, because "[the politicians] won't keep their promises unless we hold them to it."

"Our work doesn't end on [election day]," Pirmohamed said. "We are continuing our work after the election... we're going to make sure [the politicians] continue to care about education."

The cost of the campaign here was $6,385, with $3,665 provided by the AMS Board of Directors, $720 from the AMS Academic Affairs budget, $1,500 from Queen's administration and $500 from the Council of Ontario Universities.

All of the schools involved in the campaign spent similar amounts of money, said Pirmohamed.

THE JOURNAL ELECTION POLL

This past week, Queen's Journal staffers conducted a survey of Queen's students and their voting preferences.

Students were asked to indicate on a ballot the party they would vote for with the option of remaining undecided. In all, 165 students filled out ballots of remaining undecided. In all, 165 students filled out ballots in Mac-Corry, the John Deutsch University Centre, Stirling Hall, the Grey House, the Music building, the Physical Education Centre, Dunning Hall, Jeffrey Hall, the Law building, the Policy Studies building and on Union St.

The results of the survey are as follows:

PC Barry Gordon 33
NDP Mary Ann Higgs 18
Christian Heritage Terry Marshall 1
Reform Sean McAdam 10
Liberal Peter Milliken 55
National Chris Papadopoulos 0
Natural Law Chris Wilson 3

On the record: the parties talk education

The following are excerpts from the responses of the candidates who returned the Vote Education survey:

Are you in favour of reinstating the six month interest-free period on Canada Student Loans?
Liberal: Yes.
New Democratic Party: Yes.
Progressive Conservatives: We have no opinion to do so at this time.
Reform: No. Nothing is for free. [One Reform candidate did reply in the affirmative.]
National: Yes.

Currently, students pay about 20 per cent of the cost of their tuition. What percentage of the cost should students pay?
Liberal: Their fair share based on ability to pay.
NDP: Education should be affordable and accessible to everyone, not just the wealthy few. [A few candidates replied "zero."] PC: Since education is a provincial responsibility, this question would be better addressed to the provincial governments.
Reform: Reform would maintain funding at the current level.
National: When employed, students will pay taxes that support education, as they always have. Our policy is zero tuition while students are in school.

How will you reform Canada's student financial aid system to reflect the changing needs of Canadian full and part-time students?
Liberal: Reform in the Canada Student Loans program will address accessibility and university funding, as well as cost-of-living (rent, interest) relief, loan defaults, and specific concerns of all kinds of students, including full and part-time, single parents and aboriginal Canadians.
NDP: We will restore 100 per cent guarantees on student loans, repeal the three percent tax on loans, raise the weekly loan limit, allow not only big banks, but co-ops and credit unions to administer grants and loans, and consider an earnings-based schedule of repayment.

PC: Starting in 1994, we will: raise loan limits to $5,100 a year from $3,500 for full-time students, and to $4,000 from $2,500 for part-time students; provide flexibility for students with disabilities and students in special circumstances, such as single parents and mature students; expand interest relief to low-income borrowers.

Reform: The Reform party supports direct assistance to students, as opposed to funding through institutions.

National: We will repeal the three per cent tax on student loans. Grants to students of modest means must be restored.

Do you support a system of loans whereby repayment would be based on income and ability to pay? Would you run such a program through existing systems of revenue collection such as tax returns?
Liberal: Yes. But loans are loans and must be repaid.
NDP: We are open to the idea of a form of an income contingent repayment plan, however, we are sensitive to concerns expressed by the Canadian Federation of Students that such a plan could lead to significant increases in tuition fees, and that the repayment of a loan until retirement age would be as much a deterrent to higher learning by low and middle-income students as the current loan system with its immediate debt burdens.
PC: Our recently announced reforms to the Canada Student Loans Program include measures to address the needs of low-income borrowers. The federal government can now deduct unpaid student loans directly from income tax refunds. However, under the proposed reforms, the onus will be on financial institutions to recover loans.

Reform: Yes.
National: Yes.

How will you ensure that research and development are given appropriate priority in the Canadian economy?
Liberal: A Liberal government will continue to support the vital role that universities play in developing an innovative Canadian economy and we will work with universities and the private sector to increase Canada's investment in research and provide stable funding for granting councils.
NDP: We would double funding to two research granting councils... and tie future funding investments to rises in the GDP. We have also proposed a National Investment Fund which would invest well-diversified, long term venture capital in new and expanding Canadian companies.
PC: Our leader has made it clear that research and development will be given a very high priority under a new PC government, as the economy of tomorrow will be very knowledge-based. We are encouraging companies to engage in research and development by making sure they have the best tax environment in the world.
Reform: Research and development is a top priority with Reform. We feel it is our only salvation going into the twenty-first century.
National: We will cancel the Free Trade Agreement. The FTA has created a situation where American multinational corporations are allowed access to Canadian markets with no obligations to fund or build factories or research centres in Canada.

How will you help to ensure adequate summer job opportunities for students?
Liberal: A Liberal government will work in partnership with young people, the private sector, and community groups to create the Canadian Youth Service Corps.
NDP: The NDP strategy for a Full Employment Economy includes a national youth service to provide work experience for young people. To help young people get the training they need, employers would be required to either offer training or pay into a national fund.
PC: Our CHALLENGE employment program, launched in 1993 for the ninth year in a row and with funding of over $100 million, helps students make the bridge between school and the work place. It helps create career and learning-related summer jobs, and gives work experience to students who need it most.
Reform: If we stimulate the economy like we believe we can, then work positions will be available to all.
National: General improvement in the economy is the surest way of providing summer student jobs. We would also provide further incentives for employers to hire students under co-op plans related to their course of study.

Goods and Services Tax on academic text books?
Liberal: Yes. A Liberal government will eliminate the GST and replace it with a viable option which will be decided by a standing committee of the House of Commons.
NDP: Yes, immediately. We will phase out the GST itself completely in five years.
PC: No.
Reform: Yes.
National: Yes. We will remove the GST entirely, from every thing.

Student assaulted on campus

BY BROCK MARTLAND
The Queen's Journal

On Wednesday evening, a female student was physically assaulted on Queen's campus.

The woman was walking from Botterell Hall to Ban Righ at about 10:30 p.m., when she was attacked near the south side of Ban Righ.

This information was provided in a letter circulated to campus media, all departments, the Alma Mater Society, and the Graduate Students Society, from Dr. Tom Williams, vice-principal (operations and university relations).

In the letter, Williams said: "It is imperative that members of the Queen's community know about such attacks quickly, so that they may take the appropriate personal safety measures."

Howard Pearce, director of Queen's Parking and Security, said that the incident was reported Thursday morning. "We're passing it on to the police to follow up on," he said.

At press time, no further details of the incident had been released.

New library set for next fall

Douglas to house engineering and science books

BY TUDOR CALDWELL
The Queen's Journal

While most students may know about Stauffer Library, grads visiting for homecoming may wonder what's going on at Union and University.

This new building, set to open a year from now, is attracting a great deal of attention. But what many people don't realize is that it's only one part of the Library Development Program under way at Queen's.

The Library Development Program is a two-step program at the university designed to create a "Central Library Concept."

When complete, the concept

Derek Yarnell

"[The library] will be as good as anything you can get anywhere in North America." —Dr. Allan Green

"will be as good as anything you can get anywhere in North America," according to Dr. Allan Green, chair of both the Stauffer Library Building Committee and the Douglas Library Renovation Committee.

The first phase of the program will be completed with the opening of Stauffer Library in the fall of 1994, while the second phase will involve the renovations of Douglas Library for use as a consolidated library for engineering and science disciplines.

Green told The Journal that the Central Library Concept will create "two buildings that have different functions but are equal in terms of quality and facilities."

Stauffer Library is likely the most visible part of the concept. Designed by Kawabara Payne McKenna Blumberg Architects in Toronto, it is a $42 million project, $14 million of which came from the Queen's Challenge Campaign.

With seating for more than 1,200 users, and approximately 39 miles of shelving, it will meet collection storage requirement and user accommodation requirements beyond the year 2010.

The main function of Stauffer will be to house humanities and social sciences books as well as bound periodical collections.

However, it will also provide information and reference services and contain the Documents and Social Science Data Centre, as well as 135 cabinets of maps.

Facilities will be shared with the Student Art Gallery, Computing and Communications Services, and the Graduate Student Society. Green called Stauffer a "building for the future."

While still focusing on the very important role of the library with respect to acquisitions, there is to be an added emphasis on information access as well. According to Green, Stauffer will be a "gateway to other databanks and facilities worldwide."

Green pointed out that "a great deal of care has gone into interior

Yvonne Johnson

finishes ... the inside is going to be stunning." He added that the new library is designed to be "very visually appealing as well as incredibly functionally accessible."

The second crucial component in the Central Library Concept is the renovation of Douglas Library. Tentatively scheduled to start in July of 1995, the library will be architecturally and electronically upgraded to accommodate its various new uses.

"The focus of Douglas will be as an engineering and sciences central library," said Green. It has already been agreed that the various engineering branch libraries will be closed down and consolidated in the renovated Douglas.

Although no such agreement has yet been arrived at with regards to the science branch libraries, Green explained that the space has been designed in order to accommodate any branches which decide to relocate at a later date because "they will not come in all at once and they do not need to."

The existing large reading rooms will remain, with the possibility of the south reading rooms being outfitted with computer terminals. Special Collections will also remain at Douglas in expanded and renovated facilities. Technical services will continue to be located in Douglas.

Before the renovations on Douglas can begin, its contents must be removed to Stauffer. The projected date on which the new building will be turned over to Queen's is Sept. 12, 1994, and the move is expected to take about six weeks. The new library should open for use in January, 1995.

Barbara Teaturo, assistant librarian (facilities planning) at Douglas, said that in her consultations with "library move consulting companies" she has been told that the movement of the books will require three to four weeks. She anticipates that the process will be "quite complicated."

Green said that despite the magnitude of the project, "there will never be a time when you can't get books out — it will just be a matter of whether they are at Douglas or at Stauffer ... there will be no shutdown of service."

The specific holdings contained in Stauffer and Douglas, and the combined general function of the two, promise to serve the Queen's community in a unique and complete manner. Green said the "two solitudes" will be able to effectively serve two sides of the university.

Some numbers to ponder this homecoming weekend: Queen's has graduated 101,792 students. The 89,361 still-living grads are scattered among 130 countries.

CAUT bemoans federal platforms

Savage and past pres of QUFA stress education, criticize OUSA

BY SHARON WILSON
The Queen's Journal

The executive director of the Canadian Association of University Teachers paid a visit to Kingston Monday in an effort to raise the profile of federal university funding in the federal election.

Donald Savage, who met with Kingston and the Islands MP Peter Milliken and local media during his visit, stressed that "the federal government plays a really big role in Canadian universities and it is important that they continue to do so."

Savage said the federal government currently provides $950 million a year in research funding to universities, as well as $850 million a year in student assistance, including the funding of military colleges.

He commented that Canada has grown up with university funding since World War II, and said "it is important not to take it for granted."

For his part, Savage said, CAUT plans to lobby the new government "as vigorously and early as possible ... to discuss the things we want."

Some of the demands on this agenda include improving student aid arrangements, getting rid of the GST on books and periodicals, as well as getting the government to reinstate the budgets of research councils in Ottawa.

Regarding the Ontario Undergraduate Students Alliance, Grant Amyot, former president of the Queen's University Faculty Association, stated, "we do not support the policies of OUSA."

Both Savage and Amyot said they have serious reservations about the income contingent loan repayment plan endorsed by OUSA and others. The plan proposes that students pay back university loans based on their income after graduating.

Savage pointed to the "New Zealand syndrome," where the plan now exists. He said the problem is that when most students graduate they move to Australia, "it is the poor saps who stay home that end up paying it [the loan money] back."

Savage indicated that he could see the same problem arising between Canada and the United States if the income contingent loan repayment plan were put into effect in Canadian universities.

Both Savage and Amyot expressed caution on the issue of funding from the private sector to universities. OUSA supports such funding to mitigate the effects of increased tuition.

Although Savage acknowledged that universities need to be able to get funding by whatever means they can, he cautioned that universities must be aware of how many strings are attached to corporate funding.

Savage said there have been problems where corporations are able to "exercise private, behind-the-scenes influence" in the universities. He pointed to McGill University where, he said, "on several occasions wealthy supporters of McGill have attempted to get teachers fired because they did not agree with their views."

Amyot also expressed disappointment with OUSA's decision to support the provincial government's pay cuts to teachers' salaries in the social contract talks this past summer, saying "it was very shortsighted of OUSA to urge the government on."

Savage added that a very real consequence of the pay cuts could be that Canadian universities "will lose some of their stars to the United States."

Amyot concluded that OUSA's decision to support such pay cuts clearly demonstrates that "OUSA does not represent student interests."

Savage suggested there is an "air of discouragement about the future of Canadian universities" across the country.

He added that the federal candidates have not really addressed this concern seriously. Education and funding have kept a "low profile" during the election campaign, he said.

Mayor John Gerretson complaining that "city residents simply cannot endure the annual spectacle of drunkenness and destruction."

In the same article, Gerretson suggested that Queen's should cancel homecoming, and shorten orientation to two or three days from nine.

These comments were prompted by a street party which involved more than 3,000 people and saw police, students, and private property pelted with beer bottles. The Whig-Standard described the aftermath:

"The street was covered in broken glass. There were several reports of property damage to houses and cars in the area. Backyard fences and bushes were wrecked."

In 1988, according to Alumni Affairs acting director Innes Van Nostrand, an education program aimed at students was implemented, with $10,000 from Alumni Affairs and further funds from administration. This donation was made two years in a row.

After the 1988 Alumni Weekend, the Monday Oct. 17 issue of the Whig-Standard was able to report that "the weekend that has befouled town-gown relations for eight years passed without major incident."

Organizers predict that this year's weekend will also be a success.

"We've enjoyed a really good Orientation Week this year, we're looking forward to a good Alumni Weekend," said Tatham.

Tatham noted that while Alumni Weekend can be a lot of fun, the event also presents a threat to students.

"A good rule for the weekend and all the time is lock your door ... we've got an influx of a lot of people, and that leaves us vulnerable," she said.

Events this weekend are being planned for an enthusiastic student body, and what is expected to be a record crowd of alumni.

Friday's events include a Sidewalk Sale on University Ave., a free movie night at Dunning Hall, and a dance in Leonard Hall cafeteria.

Saturday events begin at 11:30 a.m., with the AMS Charity BBQ and Pep Rally to benefit the Queen's United Way campaign. Prior to the 1 p.m. Kill McGill game at Richardson Stadium, there will be a brief ceremony dedicating the game to the Frank Tindall.

At the conference, Van Nostrand said, "we know that many of our alumni feel a very strong loyalty to Frank."

On Saturday night, there will be a concert at Jock Harty Arena featuring The Stonecutters, Eric's Trip, and The Pursuit of Happiness.

In addition, alumni celebrating their 50th, 60th or 70th year reunion will attend the Principal's Dinner in the Upper Dining Room in Ban Righ Hall. Van Nostrand jokingly told the media gathered, "we always say that it might take 50 years to finally get a free meal out of the university."

Policy conference major success

Experts discuss economy and government's role

BY FRANK OXON
The Queen's Journal

With a federal election scheduled for next Monday, Canada's struggling economy is everybody's business.

So the timing couldn't have been better for the second annual Bell Canada Conference on Economic and Public Policy, hosted by Queen's last weekend.

Delegates included more than 100 economists and policy makers from the diverse sectors of academia, government, public and private corporations, and private research institutes.

The sessions began with a tribute to the late Douglas Purvis, former head of both the Queen's-based John Deutsch Institute and the economics department, who died last January at age 45.

John Helliwell, who is currently the Mackenzie King Professor of Canadian Studies at Harvard University, began the opening session on Canadian macroeconomics and growth policy.

According to Helliwell, when the conclusions of research economics are applied to policy development, predicting the future becomes truly mind-boggling, even in good times.

"All political parties in western democracies are currently having difficulty delivering on their promised deficit-reduction plans," said

"All political parties in western democracies are currently having difficulty delivering on their promised deficit-reduction plans."

—John Helliwell,
Harvard University professor

Helliwell. "When it comes to growing an economy, there is not a lot we really know with any degree of certainty. We can conclude now that communism doesn't work very well. If there is any advice I could offer to politicians, it would be to think medium-term in order to build credibility among their electorates."

University of Quebec professor Pierre Fortin outlined his strategy of "cooperative monetary discipline" for fiscal responsibility. He urged that setting wage rates more than one year in advance be outlawed.

However, Howitt acknowledged that the economic difficulties on its own," he said.

"The Bank of Canada can't solve the economic difficulties on its own."

—Pierre Fortin,
University of Quebec professor

tial with the Quebec provincial government, acknowledged that his recommendation is controversial, saying, "there would certainly be political difficulties involved in implementing this."

Fortin stopped well short of recommending wage-and-price controls, but defended his strategy of cooperative monetary discipline between governments and the private sector. "The Bank of Canada can't solve the economic difficulties on its own," he said.

It may be hard for anyone to be optimistic in difficult economic times, but according to University of Western Ontario professor Peter Howitt, the recession Canada is currently experiencing could have a silver lining.

"Some firms may introduce technological changes during a recession which they may not otherwise have done," said Howitt in his paper. "This can sometimes lead to a permanent competitive advantage if exploited properly."

However, Howitt acknowledged that the benefits of technological change are not always evenly spread throughout the economy, but may benefit some people at the expense of others.

"This differential has implications which policy makers cannot afford to ignore," he said.

John Deutsch Institute Director Thomas Courchene was very pleased with the conference's progress. "We had some excellent discussions which followed papers — those will become part of the final published proceedings."

Delegates agreed that more research, with a higher degree of cooperation and knowledge-sharing between economists of diverse viewpoints from different sectors, are required before a clearer understanding of Canada's economic future can emerge.

To that end, Bell Canada and the John Deutsch Institute will continue to offer this series of conferences at Queen's for another three years.

The John Deutsch Institute enjoys an excellent reputation in the field of economic policy, so these conferences have tremendous potential to help Canada's economy.

Centre stresses global education

BY SHARON WILSON
The Queen's Journal

At 401 Princess Street, right beside Scrabble's Laundromat, you can see one dollar of your student fees at work, inside the Kingston Global Community Centre.

Started in the summer of 1992, the KGCC describes itself as a "non-profit global education resource centre... which encourages people to take part in education about global issues, and to work with others who are struggling to create positive change in our community and elsewhere."

According to Liyu Guo, the resource coordinator at the centre, there is a large selection of books, videos and periodicals dealing with such themes as agriculture, human rights and women's issues, as well as those which focus on geographical areas.

Currently, Guo said, some Queen's students in the areas of politics, geography and film studies use the centre.

Harold Pickering, the KGCC coordinator, told The Journal that the centre "appreciates the student funding and is looking to develop a profile on campus."

In an effort to get more involved on campus, Glenn Stairs, the community and labour education coordinator, said a number of upcoming events are being planned for the school year.

Stairs said that in November, the centre is hoping to make use of popular theatre, music and videos to raise awareness in the Kingston and Queen's community about the impact of structural adjustment policies" on "so-called developing countries."

For the month of March, the centre is working with groups on campus such as the Queen's Black History Collective to bring a tour of three African filmmakers to Kingston. There will also be activities during International Development Week in February.

Guo encouraged students to take advantage of an electronic mail system, "WEB," which is "a network that provides access to the most up-to-date information globally."

Another feature of the KGCC is the Just Trade Store, a shop which, according to the centre's literature, aims to "correct the trade imbalance between rich and industrialized nations and the countries of Africa, Asia and the Americas."

The literature stresses that their "distributors purchase high quality hand-made goods directly from cooperatives and small-scale workshops, ensuring that primary producers receive fair compensation for their labour."

According to Pickering, the centre would eventually like to reach a level where the store will serve as an "educational experience." Ultimately the individual buying the good "will know where it came from and be aware of the impact their money will have," he said.

The centre is currently staffed by four full-time employees and is always looking for more volunteers. The KGCC is open Monday to Friday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

University of Western Ontario

The Gazette, October 1

Students and faculty of UWOU's ill-fated Graduate School of Journalism are claiming that deans of other faculties lined up behind administration's proposal to eliminate the program out of greed. One professor at the journalism school said that VP-academic Tom Collins "told the rest of the deans," "Throw these guys overboard and there will be more for the rest of you."

On Sept. 29, the university's senate voted to close the school at the end of this year. Journalism schools across the country are angered by the decision. The director of journalism at King's College in Halifax, Michael Cobden, dismissed the justification used by UWOU's administration — that journalism is no longer a priority at Western — as rhetoric. "Whenever I hear universities talk about a central mission I feel sick to my stomach," he said.

The Varsity, October 12

A tenured U of T professor, Herbert Richardson, faces dismissal from U of T's St. Michael's College due to an alleged "breach of fiduciary responsibility" — or breach of trust. According to Adel Sedra, "this came at the end of a big series of incidents all related to negligence of duties or complaints by students." Sedra said that the university was also "concerned that [Richardson] took a medical leave and it came to our attention that in fact he was using the time to conduct his personal business."

In a further development, a St. Michael's College administrator has confirmed accusations made by professor Richardson that the college has hired a private investigator.

Surface in question

Lower Victoria Hall after the meeting.

"The ASUS assembly voted to support the students' [opinion]," Steeves said. Although she "personally support[s] the paper wholeheartedly," Steeves said she will not let her feelings interfere with her duties as ASUS president.

"I am an elected representative of the students, and I ran on a platform of representing students," she said. "That is what I plan to do."

Despite the executive's commitment to following the results of the referendum, both Steeves and Heath Grant, ASUS vice-president, expressed regret about the likely end of Surface.

"The paper has sparked a lot of constructive debate about what minority issues are and how they are expressed," Steeves noted. "Sur- face represents minority views. We asked Arts and Science students if they would pay to support a paper that supports minority views. Maybe [students] don't want to pay for it, maybe they don't support it," Steeves said, adding that she couldn't speak for students' motivations in rejecting the referendum question.

Steeves maintained that Surface's outlook changed this year. "It still expresses a viewpoint, but one that is historically or factually based," she said. "A critical base is very important to the paper," she added.

Heath Grant addressed financial matters arising from the referendum. "As of today [Tuesday], ASUS has financial authority over the Surface [financial] accounts," he said. Surface's funding was suspended late last year, he explained, and the first two issues this year were funded with last year's left-over surplus.

Steeves also raised the possibility that Surface could still be published without funding by ASUS. However, she said she wasn't aware of what action the editor was planning on taking.

The ASUS executive said they have no plans to introduce a new Arts and Science paper during their current term in office, although Steeves admitted that the "groundwork is done" for the creation of a new paper for the Arts and Science community.

Queen's then and now

This is a weekend for reminiscing, for seeing old friends, for comparing then and now.

As we look back at many of the issues Queen's students have faced over the years, we see a number of similarities and a few differences in approach.

One of the big issues in 1974 - as it is today - was housing. Except then, the issue centred around a housing shortage. The Queen's University Off-Campus Tenants' Association was founded and quickly grew to a membership of close to 1,300. The goal was to educate tenants as to their rights and obligations under the Landlord-Tenant Act and property by-law standards for the City of Kingston. Housing issues arise every year, and the idea of forming such an association was raised last year. Today concerns centre around safety and respect for our neighbours.

In 1975, three years after Morris Hall turned co-ed, a Journal editorial urged the Residence Board to consider more co-educational residences at Queen's. Now, the only all-male residence at Queen's is Leonard Hall. This has been attributed in part to a higher number of female students, as well as to changed attitudes held by both students and parents.

In 1978, the Alma Mater Society Outer Council voted in favour of a tuition fee increase as being "preferable to a deterioration of the university system." The editorial board at The Journal responded that "...the assertion that such a position is in the interests of students is totally misconceived."

Today, most members of The Journal editorial board are supportive of hiked tuition fees, only, however, in the context of the On-get the provinces on his side. The editorial quoted Queen's Professor Richard Simeon as saying "...the sense in Ottawa that things (prior to the Quebec referendum) had gone too far, we were already too fragmented and too balkanized..."

Twelve years later Simeon's alcohol ban at Richardson Stadium was responsible for lower attendance. That alcohol ban is now taken for granted, but the problem has not disappeared.

One of the biggest issues of the year 1989 strikes chords with Queen's students today. The issue was Temagami. And this year at Clayoquot Sound. The editorial board asked of the Peterson government, "...wouldn't it be wise, at least, to err on the side of caution and stop the logging now?" The sentiments here have not changed.

In 1990/91, the editorial board at The Journal was concerned with the slowness of the procedure in place to deal with the Gordon House incident. Today, Queen's still feels the aftershocks of the incident, especially now as the pendulum seems to be swinging back and silencing the voices of those who used the incident as a springboard for making their voices heard.

In 1991/92, housing issues hit the editorial pages again, (as they have already done this year), as did concern over date rape and sexual assault. The Journal has covered two sexual assaults in the first two months of the 1993/94 academic year. Many more go unreported.

Many of these same issues will grace editorial pages in the years to come. Many more will arise. The students of Queen's will continue to face them head on, with voices loud and proud.

tario Undergraduate Student Alliance proposals. Both editorial boards, then and now, have found need to criticize the Ontario government's financial commitment to maintaining the quality of education.

In 1981, an all too familiar topic graced the editorial page of The Journal. The topic was the constitution, and Trudeau's attempts to words seem remarkably apropos. As we move through the eighties, the issues centre around street parties, the need for improved town/gown relations and then finally in 1987, low attendance at football games.

"The Queen's Spirit ... seems to have come to a screeching halt," the editorial said.

The editorial suggested that the

What would Alfie think?

Although it may not be apparent to most, a beloved institution is decaying in front of our very eyes.

It seems Alfie's Pub is just not as popular as it once was and the reason is simple - Alfie's has not adapted to the changing times.

To find Alfie's halcyon years one must only look back only three years to a Kingston night-life which did not include the Shot, A.J.'s or Dr. Girdy's. In those days it was rare for Alfie's not to be filled to capacity every Thursday to Saturday night. Unfortunately for Alfie's, downtown bars, including all three of the aforementioned bars, have flourished, while Alfie's is now floundering.

A case in point. One recent Saturday night, (only the fourth weekend of the year), Alfie's managers shut down the pub because of a lack of people. On the night in question the Shot was filled to capacity, indicating it was certainly not a slow night in general, but slow only for Alfie's. This is not the only demonstration of student apathy towards Alfie's, in fact Alfie's has twice been shut down early for lack of attendance, and just this past Saturday, according to Alfie's staff, there were only 40 people in attendance to watch the Blue Jays game.

The problem is obvious: Alfie's is losing its clientele to the downtown bars. The question is why? One reason is of course price competition. Because of the administration's policy of not encouraging student alcohol consumption, Alfie's is forced to maintain its regular drink prices every night of the week, while downtown bars offer discount drinking promotions advertising cheap drinks and student specials. Furthermore, downtown bars are not subject to the same strict capacity and identification regulations as Alfie's.

Yet alcohol prices and admission criteria are not the only selling points of a bar as Alfie's success in the past has demonstrated.

The primary reason for the decline of Alfie's fortunes lies in its lackadaisical marketing strategy. Of the three major campus pubs, Alfie's has the least aggressive marketing strategy. The Quiet Pub, through its extensive poster campaign (they even have posters in Jeffery Hall, the math building) promotes itself as a place to watch movies and television, and as a place to "hear recognizable tunes and have alternative drinks."

Clark Hall pursues the opposite tack, offering students alternative music and the basic beverage of beer. Clark Hall, like the QP, also effectively promotes itself through posters, but it also attracts patrons in other less obvious ways, such as handing out flyers to people waiting in an Alfie's line-up. Not surprisingly Clark Hall is prospering.

Compared to Clark Hall and the QP, the marketing strategy of Alfie's is anemic and unfocused, seeming to consist of little more than some QEA sponsored Journal ads and few well-placed posters in the JDUC and Mac-Corry. Despite this lack of promotion, Alfie's still has the ability to garner a crowd when they offer viable attractions.

For instance, (despite a two dollar cover charge) Alfie's shows a healthy crowd almost every Wednesday night, when it presents live bands.

Complicating its marketing problems, is Alfie's reliance on first-year students. Gone are the days when frosh attended Alfie's simply by default of tradition. These days, many frosh are below the legal drinking age and simply skip the first year Alfie's "stage" that many have passed through.

Of course promotion becomes much easier when the product is improved. To this end Alfie's could endure a number of renovations/improvements to its post-apocalyptic trappings. Better, essentially a windowless cave. Alfie's is at a somewhat natural disadvantage. However, there is one reason why the student body should be subjected to a flimsy dance floor, uncomfortable seats and mildew friendly climate, not mention the shoddy pool tables and awkward serving system.

Some may question the need for Alfie's, but it is assuredly an integral part of the Queen's experience. It is a Queen's tradition, a source of pride and memories. And although possessing its share of problems, serves a valuable function as a social and localized drinking space. Downtown bars may offer cheaper drinks, but the crowd is rougher, there is no walk-in service, student constables are on hand to provide for your safety and a cab is often the only reliable way home.

Yes, Alfie's is in no danger of extinction, but just as Queen's expects the best from its students, students have a right to expect more from one of their favoured institutions.

Wrong Reactions

The Editor,
At about 10:30 am on Tuesday, Oct. 19, I was sitting in Mac-Corry, rather distressed at realizing through The Journal, that a friend of mine had been assaulted. What distressed me even more, however, was a conversation that I overheard.

Three women were discussing the assault of Ms. McKay and decided that she had handled her situation "poorly." "Why did she wait so long?" "Why did she go to the Toucan in the first place?" "I would have gone straight to police," etc. etc.

These comments enrage me. Rather than being concerned that a fellow student was assaulted they were questioning the way in which she dealt with it.

From first hand experience I can say that when a woman is assaulted she will feel dirty, like it was her fault, and in most circumstances, she will not want to let ANYONE know about it: Under current society, assault reflects more upon the survivor than the situation or the assaultee himself. That Ms. McKay even went to the police and has the courage to describe these men, demonstrates that she is a very brave woman. Her story should not be discredited, nor the seriousness of it diminished because she could not believe that it happened to her, or because she tried to block the assault out of existence.

Maybe if you pinned me against a wall by a group of drunken strangers (or pinned to your bed by your partner, perhaps), and you could feel the panic of knowing what was going to happen, your righteous thoughts of reporting the assault immediately would be blocked. Blocked by disgust, fear, humiliation and the sense of being stripped of your strength, autonomy and self.

Next time you question how a woman "handles" an assault, please keep in mind... she would not have had to "handle" anything if she had not been assaulted in the first place.

Explaining Opt-Outs

The Editor,
Each year the AMS administers the collection of student activity fees in association with the Registrar. All of these fees have been democratically approved through referendum. Certain fees are deemed opt-outable if so stated in their referendum question. The AMS health plan, for example, was passed in a referendum with the stipulation that the fee is mandatory unless written proof of alternative coverage is provided during the opt-out period.

This year we made many changes to our process in order to make opt-outs and the health plan more accessible for students. For the first time, students could pick up their health plan cards at registration and be able to use them immediately. In the past, these cards were not available until mid-October and had to be picked up from the AMS. During registration, when all undergraduate students received their card information about the opt-out process was made available. Every student should, thus, have been aware that they had the health plan unless they subsequently satisfied the opt-out requirements.

As usual, the opt-out period was scheduled during the last 2 weeks of September. It was advertised in The Journal, on posters, and through assorted other media in order to create as much awareness as possible. Additionally, this year was the first year that the process was computerized thus reducing filing errors and making it more efficient for students. In fact, five thousand people successfully managed to opt-out this September.

Since the end of the opt-out period, there have been a number of requests and concerns brought forward regarding the process. To opt some students out of certain fees after the deadline would be unfair to the number of people who have not come forward with a request and are assuming that the deadline will be honoured. We must be fair to everyone and play by the same

We recognize that the opt-out process was not flawless. We will be meeting with the Registrar to discuss distributing more information in the summer registration packages so that the issue will be more clear to all students. In the meantime, we will honour the opt-out deadline.

Hypocrisy in the "NO" Campaign

The Editor,
We (by "we" I refer to whites and/or straights and/or males because those are the groups to whom this article is addressed) expect members of oppressed groups to read mainstream literature from the past in the context in which it was written. Much of Plato's writing is blatantly androcentric and several of Shakespeare's plays (Taming of the Shrew for example) are misogynistic. Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn continually refers to a major character as "Nigger Jim." Ernest Hemingway, in several of his works, presents a very homophobic depiction of gay men. However, we do not condemn the authors or their works because they were writing in a context (in this case a historical context) in which these offensive ideas were considered the norm. Thus we ask members of oppressed groups, to whom these ideas are incredibly offensive, to ignore what is problematic, or at least appreciate the work and its substance distinct from that which is offensive. This kind of "selective reading" is necessary in order for human beings to communicate. One must take out what speaks to them and look for the positive in what is written — provided that it is written in a context where the particular negative concept is at least understandably present, if not justifiable. Some people may not wish to do this, and they will not read that author or that work, which is their right, but we certainly would not tolerate them saying that that author or that work should be banned and no longer read by anyone.

The Editor(s) of, and contributors to Surface have turned the tables. They say to the oppressors: "You have forced us to appreciate the context in which things are written — now we ask you to do the same." The contributors to Surface are writing in a particular context as well. That is the sociological context of our society — one in which oppressed people are finally able to speak out about their oppression and be heard by the oppressors, after centuries of dominance and forced silence. In Surface the contributors are attempting to spread the message of what it feels like to be oppressed in a supposedly "free" society. Often this message is conveyed with anger, frustration, and what borders on hatred. However, if we (that same "we") were to follow our own rules, we would acknowledge the context in which these people were writing and thus appreciate that, although we may be offended by particular passages, an overall positive effect can be achieved — if we do not close our minds immediately after coming across a couple of offensive phrases.

Andrew Dick, Michael Carnegie

The truth surfaces

The Editor,
I am writing to express my disappointment with the results of the ASUS referendum on Surface, and in particular with the comments made in Tuesday, Oct. 19's Journal by the leaders of the No Campaign, Andrew Dick and Michael Carnegie. It seems that now that these people have effectively succeeded in shutting down Surface, they feel free to show their true colours on the issue. Dick, Carnegie et al never really had any interest in seeing Surface continue in its present form, or in any form that would remotely present marginalized groups. I find it amusing that Dick says, "Surface is not the only voice for marginalized groups." Where are the other voices on campus? And since when has Dick been the authority on this issue?

Furthermore, I think the anti-Surface leaders' remarks reflect an ignorance about the role of campus media in general. Carnegie said in The Journal that it would be preferable for ASUS to have "A bit of power over the Editor." The media are supposed to be generating discussion using independent information, they are not meant to be controlled like puppets by student governments. How can minorities be represented by majoritarian student governments?

Finally, people should be made aware that Andrew Dick himself is quoted as saying that Surface is "something that's bad." And all along they made us think that they simply didn't feel right about paying fifty-nine cents for the paper! The truth is these people opposed Surface because they didn't agree with its progressive message, they don't think anyone should be exposed to that "agenda", and frankly, the only logical conclusion that I could come to was that the nationally renowned "Queen's Spirit" must be on the wane. This is a very disturbing thought for me. So many students claim that the spirit of the place was the reason they came. While part of the spirit is centred around academic excellence, another vitally important part centres around support for the endeavors of our athletic squads.

Students living in residence, especially those in their first year, might claim that they do not know when or where the football games are being held. This is an unacceptable excuse. The Queen's bands parade through the residence area before every home football game making enough noise to raise the dead. They then proceed to parade to the stadium for the game. The whole purpose of this is that people in residence should join in the parade. Up until a few years ago this actually happened. Don't be afraid to join in behind the Bands and in front of the police.

This Saturday is the final football game of the regular season. It is being played at home. It is "Kill McGill." It is being televised nationally on TSN. It is Alumni Weekend. What we ask is that the members of the current Queen's population set their books aside for three hours, parade to the stadium, and enjoy the football game. What we ask is that you turn out in un-

Gaels' game attendance: Don't blame the weather!

The Editor,
I had thought that the several letters written to you and the articles written for you last week on the subject of student attendance at football games would have made a difference. I obviously placed too much confidence in the student body here at Queen's.

Over the last several days I have been trying to come up with a logical explanation for the lack of student support for the football team. At first I thought that the weather must have been the reason. I must have been wrong though, because on Saturday the weather could not have been any better for a football game.

I thought back to the raucous support the football team enjoyed last year. I seriously doubt that all those people that supported the team last year are no longer here.

Another possible explanation that has been put forward is that students are now spending their Saturdays studying. While this is possible, I would like to suggest to those students to whom this applies that they should think about the following. Studies have shown that you can only study for about half an hour without showing an appreciable decrease in the amount of information retained after the 30 minute mark. In short, it is in the best interest of your studies to take a 3 hour break from the books on Saturday afternoon.

More Marriott musings

The Editor,
I realize I left myself open to criticism after writing harsh comments about a Marriott employee; however, I would like to clarify a few points for Ms. Gayle.

Since you have been at Queen's for a month, you were unable to read The Journal in March and April of this year. Marriott management was highly criticized in those months and I remained silent. It was not until the article that appeared in The Journal, Sept. 21 that I could no longer tolerate the one-sided arguments against Marriott management.

The article appeared to be favouring the workers and the union and implied that nothing positive could be said about the management. The one employee who made the comment about being treated like a child was making a generalized statement about all employees and all Marriott management. Maybe my comment was harsh; however, from my personal experience at work, some employees have been known to have their own food and water fights, take unauthorized social/smoke breaks, use the phone during company time, etc. This kind of childish behaviour results in management having to respond to immature employees in the appropriate manner. Basically, having to constantly watch employees do their required work. We will never know his actual work performance, nor if he does have an attitude; however, his comment had a powerful and negative impact on the image of Marriott management.

So funny I forgot to laugh

The Editor,
I was pleased to see that Joey DeVilla's hilarious cartoon was replaced with something new in the Oct. 15 issue. I congratulate "DW" on creating a work with a lack of humour well suited to the Opinions page. "DW" must have thought long and hard to choose such an appropriate title for his cartoon. His accidental lapse into a slightly humorous mode — after all, it is hard to be unfunny all the time.

In eliminating the one light spot in The Journal, you instantly improve my outlook on Tuesdays and Fridays. If only Golden Words would take a similar attitude. Queen's would finally be devoid of frivolous humour.

Clayoquot, the Sound of Silence

At 6:15 a.m. on August 13, 1993, I sat down in a circle of 13 people. It was a crisp morning, with clouds hanging in the sky, and an almost invisible moistness permeated the cool valley air. This circle was a Quaker prayer circle, but this was no ordinary occasion. Gazing across the bridge into the forest beyond, we felt like a thin line of defense against an encroaching human presence of a cold and mechanical nature; against a disrespectful, destructive assault on the vulnerable web of life that lay behind us. In accordance with tradition, our prayer circle sat in contemplative silence, and one-by-one we each gave our voice to the circle, as our feelings strengthened, and we rose above our fears. "I sit here for the animals, for the trees, for the plants, and for all life in a forest that cannot speak for itself except in beauty." "I sit here against the greed of humanity, against a system so very far removed from our basic needs, and which distorts our simple and necessary link with nature." "I sit here for our future, for our children and their futures, that they may inherit a trust, a trust which we have held, to provide them with clean air, water and land, a planet with vitality, and not a scorched, abused piece of Earth." And finally, I spoke my peace: "I sit here because I have no choice. Because I know the difference between right and wrong. Because I see beauty here in the forest, and if there's one thing I've learned about life, it is that truth can be found in beauty. I cannot hide from the truth." On that cool summer morning, I was arrested at Clayoquot Sound for listening to my conscience, for standing up in the name of common sense, for trusting my instincts, for caring about the future.

History

On April 13, 1993, the NDP government under Premier Mike Harcourt announced the "Clayoquot Compromise," which promises to protect 33% of the land base of Clayoquot Sound from logging. This compromise was several years in the making, and claimed to address the interests of the various parties concerned: local communities, First Nations, logging companies, environmentalists, the loggers themselves and their families. The interests of Clayoquot Sound wildlife, as well as future citizens of B.C. and the world, are presumably represented by the environmentalists. The Clayoquot Compromise was based on the results of a committee set up in 1991 to explore strategies for "sustainable development." The NDP government and MacMillan Bloedel Limited have led a campaign of misinformation about the recent decision. They have failed to address the real problem which rests on a number of important issues, and they have largely ignored the concerns of the environmentalists, who left the negotiating table on the accusation that the government had no real commitment to the process. In fact clearcuts continued during the planning process itself. The First Nations, who comprise over 50% of the population of Clayoquot Sound, clearly opposed the NDP decision and have now stated their intent to blockade if necessary.

What then are the key issues and questions at stake in the battle over Clayoquot Sound? There is little doubt about the uniqueness and the aesthetic qualities of one of the largest remaining temperate rainforests on earth. Is it a simple jobs versus environment issue? Is it a case of clearcuts versus selective logging? What is sustainable development—a sustaining of the present old-growth ecosystem, or a sustaining of timber supply to maintain monetary profit? Or is it something in between? What are better alternatives than the present NDP decision?

A Jobs versus Environment Issue?

Those of us who oppose the NDP decision and subsequent clearcutting of the Sound are not necessarily anti-jobs, as the logging

MacMillan Bloedel's road to profit will continue to be lost under the present status quo. The NDP decision is a short-sighted one; instead of job creation through the promotion of secondary industries and alternative land uses, the provincial government has opted to continue the process of pillaging our natural resources, on the erroneous assumption that our natural resources are unlimited and/or replaceable. Such a wasteful and unsustainable process can no longer mask the fact that we are living beyond our means, that fundamental structural

What is Clayoquot Sound?

- Clayoquot Sound is situated on the west coast of Vancouver Island, B.C.
- Clayoquot Sound is the world's largest remaining temperate rainforest
- 90% of the world's temperate rainforests have been destroyed
- 25% of what's left is on Vancouver Island; 25% of this is in Clayoquot Sound; 23% of Clayoquot Sound has already been logged. Logging continues as you read this.
- Clayoquot Sound is home to thousands of animal and plant species, many still unidentified, including old-growth Douglas Fir, Hemlock, Sitka Spruce, and Western Red Cedar hundreds of years old.
- Of 199 primary watersheds over 1,000 hectares on Vancouver Island, only 29 remain unlogged, and only 7 are protected, including 3 in Clayoquot Sound. (Source: B.C. Ministry of Forests, Integrated Resources Branch, 1990) companies would like to label us. Over the last ten years, the number of jobs in the Clayoquot-Alberni region have been consistently cut due to industry mechanization. In the last four years alone, 1,300 direct forestry jobs have been lost in Port Alberni (where logs are minimally processed into raw timber and pulp and paper). These jobs will continue to be lost under the present status quo. The NDP decision is a short-sighted one; instead of job creation through the promotion of secondary industries and alternative land uses, the provincial government has opted to continue the process of pillaging our natural resources, on the erroneous assumption that our natural resources are unlimited and/or replaceable. Such a wasteful and unsustainable process can no longer mask the fact that we are living beyond our means, that fundamental structural

Native Land Claims

The native people who live in and around the Clayoquot Region are referred to collectively as the Nuu-chah-nulth ("all along the mountains"). They inhabit a number of villages in Clayoquot Sound, and make up about 50% of the population of the area, although their reserves make up only 0.4% of the land base. The Nuu-chah-nulth have never relinquished their rights to Clayoquot Sound, and are currently making land claims to the area. In 1985, they conducted a blockade of logging on Meares Island, one of the larger islands of the Sound. A moratorium on logging is now in place on the island, as land claims are being settled through the courts.

The native people have managed to live sustainably off the land for thousands of years. Their culture has developed around an intimate knowledge of the land, and despite changes brought about through European contact, including population decline and a limited commercial economy, their institutions and pattern of land use remain essentially intact. Their major industries are fishing (accounting for 73% of jobs) and tourism (accounting for 21% of jobs).

The native people are not opposed to all logging. What they are opposed to is the destruction of the ecosystem in which they live. While they demand local possession over the land which they claim is rightfully theirs, their major concern is the well-being of the land. Currently, the courts are entertaining native claims to the land, while logging in these disputed areas continues. The natives may find themselves in possession of nothing more than landscapes of tree stumps and destroyed forest.

Changing Logging Techniques?

The NDP government at MacMillan Bloedel would like to believe that they are making fundamental changes in their logging techniques, and claim the adoption of "selective" logging techniques and smaller clearcuts. An examination of MacMillan Bloedel's records and the proposed changes reveal that these changes are cosmetic and merely serve to placate public opinion. Logging in the Tofino Creek watershed began in 1987, and is an example of the company's most modern logging techniques. An official management plan was set up by representatives from MacMillan Bloedel, the province, the labour union and municipal representatives—in spite of the fact that they themselves admitted they knew virtually nothing about the ecosystem they were about to enter. MacMillan Bloedel went ahead and built a road into a prohibited area, as well as cut down protected areas of the forest. The company was subsequently fined but less than the value of the wood it removed.

These actions should not be surprising, as MacMillan Bloedel has an extensive criminal record, with endless convictions on such charges as "destroying fish habitat through negligent logging practices," "failure to report a chemical spill," "violating our Fisheries Waters Act for 'violating the terms of its public opinion.'" Between 1991 and the present time alone, MacMillan Bloedel has stood in violation of the law at least fifty times. The violations have fallen within the boundaries of laws governing fishing, waste management, water resources (in Ontario), pest control and environmental protection. Where are the regulations concerning forestry practice?

Clayoquot Sound cannot become an experiment in "modern" logging techniques. The government claims that the size of clear-cutting is constantly regenerating, to ensure that levels of pollution are controlled, to ensure that the same resources available to us are avail-

Calling all Environmentalists

The Canadian Unified Student Environmental Network (CUSEN) is an environmental youth network that seeks to facilitate action on environment, development and social justice issues. We are supported primarily by college, CEGEP and university students across Canada, although all youth are welcome to join. Queen's chapter of CUSEN was established three years ago as the central office for the Canadian network. Last year, we received student interest fees to establish a resource centre here on campus. We have held actions and solidarity days for James Bay II, NAFTA, and most recently, Waste Reduction and Clayoquot Sound.

Researching environmental issues can be frustrating—accurate information exists, but it is difficult to come by. Instead of one massive clearcut, they propose smaller size clearcuts (20 to 40 hectares) with so-called "biodiversity corridors" separating them. 400 metres in width. These corridors fail to take into account the natural patterns of migration within an ecosystem—these methods have no basis in modern scientific ecological theory. The failure of these methods should be obvious from the past, as these sparse, "protected" patches of trees have tended to blow down, without adequate protection from strong winds and isolated from the rest of the ecosystem. The corporation can then make profit through the removal of these fallen trees, using their "salvage rights."

Sustainable Development

Perhaps the greatest obstacle to a decision acceptable to all parties is a differing conception of "sustainable development." To industry and the government (which is actually the largest single shareholder in MacMillan Bloedel since February, and thus has a direct financial interest in the company) it is supposed to be regulating (read: conflict of interest). Clayoquot Sound is merely seen as a repository of potential cash profit, just waiting to be converted as quickly as possible. Any regulations or limitations on their removal efficiency are seen as necessary obstacles and barriers.

Government-determined guidelines and unenforced regulations are shields to hide behind and deter public opinion. To industry and government, then, sustainability refers to the ability to transform wilderness into tame, reliable tree farms. Little effort is actually expended to maintain sustainability, long-term vision has never been strength in the face of short-term profits.

To environmentalists, sustainability refers to the responsible use of our environment to ensure that the land is constantly regenerating, to ensure that levels of pollution are controlled, to ensure that the same resources available to us are available to our children. These resources include more than just a steady supply of cut wood, but also the natural beauty conferred upon us by nature, and a balanced, safe ecosystem. Sustainability should therefore recognize diverse interests in Clayoquot Sound, interests which see the world not solely in terms of material profit, but which spread out over a wide variety of sources. CUSEN's Environmental Resource Centre is designed to guide students and members of the community through the maze of available materials. The Centre stocks information with perspectives from the far right to the far left of the spectrum of environment, development and social justice issues. The information we carry has an emphasis on youth and for the most part, is not available through mainstream library systems.

We believe that our most important role is to provide students with the knowledge and support they need to take informed and effective action. CUSEN-QUEEN'S holds weekly meetings on Tuesdays at 9:30 in the Grey House. Contact us at 548-3838 for more information.

Soon to be a rare sight in Clayoquot Sound understand the intrinsic value in the area, and should strike a more natural balance between development and leaving nature to itself.

This idea of sustainable development implies that development itself must remain limited, and is more congruent with such actions as diversifying areas of development to promote tourism activities, limited fishing, and carefully regulated selective logging along with secondary industry. The present focus of development must move beyond providing profits to centralized industry, that uses a local labour force where necessary. Instead, there should be a focus on the communities directly involved in forest areas, and "community forests" can then be managed by local communities within the bounds of provincial or federal regulation of environmental abuses. This development in favour of local communities has an advantage in that it would be able to focus on meeting the communities' best interests, which includes a long-term stake in a healthy ecosystem. It would also limit the dependence of communities on a remotely-based industry and give them control over their own future. There are no immediate answers, but our range of options—which does not include the present clearcutting—must be explored. We must be creative in our search for a better path.

Uncertain Future

The current blockades at Clayoquot Sound, which have received wide media coverage, have not slowed logging at all. Over 850 citizens have volunteered arrest to date, and currently face criminal contempt of court charges. This is the largest mass arrest in Canadian history. Could it be they are achieving the very opposite?

What is at stake in this issue is not only the survival of Clayoquot Sound itself. Instead, we are defining for ourselves the way we conduct business in British Columbia and in Canada. The government and industry face some very tough questions from the public. For many people, Clayoquot Sound is the "final straw" after years of negligent forestry practice and frustration at the decision-making process. Many others are confronting these important issues for the first time, as their attention has been drawn by the media, and by the geographical proximity of Clayoquot Sound. This type of mass participation by the public is unprecedented in Canadian history, and the government cannot ignore the message. This issue is crucial for industry because of its precedent-setting nature. A precedent is being set in that they are being asked to be held accountable for their actions. They can no longer conduct their business as usual, behind closed doors and beyond the view of the public. To the extent that their actions involve and violate the public good, so should the public be allowed to regulate and limit their actions. Clayoquot Sound is crown land, owned by the public. It is the people of Canada who allow the logging of our land. It is both our right and our responsibility, then, to determine the nature of our land usage. It is up to us, not the companies, to ensure the common survival of our environment and its inhabitants. The interests of the forest industry and of the people are not one and the same.

Think. Take Action and Participate.

What we need is a better understanding of our relationship with the land, with the earth. Environmentalism is about understanding and respecting nature, which is all around us, which permeates our lives more than we realize. It is about opening our eyes and understanding that every action we take has direct and indirect consequences on the world, and understanding the destructive course that our society has been, and still is, following. It is about taking off the blinders that our society has imposed upon us, substitutes such as short-term profit and money which have placed us at a distance from the reality of our self-destruction. Environmentalism involves a fundamental shift in thought and action in which we take responsibility for everything we do. It is not a new concept or a trendy social movement. It is, in fact, an age-old view of the world, a view which understands the need to respect life in order to fulfill our own place within the mass network of living things which make up the planet we call Earth.

What you can do

1. Keep informed. Don't rely on one source. Think critically about the underlying issues. Do they really make sense to you?

2. Keep aware of the stance of political parties on the environment. Write to the government and let them know your opinions. Make the environment an issue.

3. Write/phone/fax the following, and ask for an immediate halt to the logging. Ask them questions.

Kingston: From Champlain to the A & P

Written in Stone: A Kingston Reader
 Edited by Mary Alice Downie and M.A. Thompson Quarry Press
 261 pages

As a tribute to one of Canada's most historical cities, Written in Stone: A Kingston Reader is long overdue. It is an anthology of writing about and from Kingston, providing a colourful portrayal of the city, from its origins in the 1800s to the present.

It is enlightening to be able to see the evolution of Kingston through the selections in the anthology, from Samuel de Champlain and Thomas Moore's observations of fledgling Kingston, to Judith Thompson and Diane Schomperlen's views of a city which has endured a great deal. The early accounts of Kingston are varied—some are critical, while others praise the city's compelling beauty. It is also interesting to note how the style of these early writings, which are mainly excerpts from the diaries and journals of those who have drifted through Kingston, contrast with the semi-fictional impressions given of Kingston in the more contemporary period.

Elizabeth Simcoe writes about the native population around Kingston in the 1800s: There are Mississauga Indians here they are an unwarlike, idle, drunken, dirty tribe. I observe how extremes meet. These uncivilized People saunter up & down the Town all the day, with the apparent Nonchalance, want of occupation & indifference that seems to possess Bond street Beaux. She also recounts sailing expeditions on the lake, church visits, and taking tea with the ladies of the town—indications of how predominant the customs of England still were in nineteenth-century Kingston.

La Rochefoucauld, a French emigrant, and Charles Dickens both give less-than-glowing reports of Kingston. Rochefoucauld finds the city to be an uncultured barbaric place, while Dickens has a very narrow perception of Kingston, seeming to be preoccupied with the prisons. A poem by Charles Dawson Shanly about the hardships of working in the mines ends with the line, "Upon my ferent aspects of life in the city. The medley of images and opinions echoes the goal of the anthology, to be "a handbook, a reader, a guide to this swirling panorama." The editors of Written in Stone are not trying to give us a coherent, logical view of Kingston—in- stead, they are presenting us with the richness of its many facets.

Several pieces in the anthology are reflections on life in the institutions for which Kingston is so renowned (after all, anyone who isn't from the city immediately thinks of it as a mecca of educational institutes, prisons and mental hospitals). One account of life in the prisons in the 1840s, given by an incarcerated participant of the Rebellion of 1837, is particularly touching. It recounts the death of a sick man in the prison, and his delirious rantings: "Do, mother, do, dear sister, make my pillow softer; do come and tell me you love me; oh! let me hear those words once more! Oh! the gloomy prison walls—the cells—the chains—how cold and heavy they are on my aching limbs! Will they not take them off even when I'm dying? Must I die in chains?" Also particularly worthy of note for all the Michael Ondaatje followers is an excerpt from his novel In the Skin of the Lion, about the escape of an inmate. Susanna Moodie also provides a (rather unfeeling) glimpse into life behind bars.

As for Queen's itself, Robertson Davies writes at length about Kingston and the university, saying that Kingston "enjoys a satisfying consciousness of past glories and, in a modest way, makes its own rules," and that "the sons and daughters of [Queen's] love their Alma Mater as the disciples of Socrates loved their master." One of my favourite pieces was Janette Turner Hospital's account of life as a "faculty wife," which she describes as the end of her life as "a normal intelligent woman." Her refusal to conform soul/ Kingston thou art indeed a blasted hole." Walt Whitman, on the other hand, seems to have nothing but praise for the city: I write this in the most beautiful extensive region of lakes and islands one can probably see on earth... Land of pure air! Land of unnumbered lakes! Land of the islets and the woods! From these various interpretations of Kingston in the 1800s, a more complete vision gradually emerges, embodying the many dif-

Faultlines: Struggling for a Canadian Vision
 Jeffrey Simpson
 Harper Collins
 386 pages

If proof of the relevance and timeliness of Jeffrey Simpson's Faultlines is required, it will almost assuredly be provided less than one week from today.

On Monday, Canadians appear set to vote for the most eclectic and unstable Parliament since 1921, when the neophyte populist and western-based Progressive Party swept the West and relegated the governing Conservatives to third party status. Compare this to the current popularity of the Reform Party and toss in the Bloc Quebecois for a little more excitement, and you may begin to comprehend just how singular this election will be.

Taking a step back, Simpson's Faultlines looks at the roots of the frustration, disillusionment and restlessness that have been so apparent during this race.

A collection of profiles of prominent Canadians, Faultlines provides compelling first-hand accounts of the vastly different and competing visions that have characterized Canada during the late 1980s and early 1990s. In an extremely novel and readable approach, Simpson—The Globe and Mail's national political columnist, currently a Fellow at Stanford University—forgoes a tired, orthodox way of looking at the divisions that exist in contemporary Canada.

Instead of merely writing a chronological rehash of the political, social and constitutional clashes of the last decade (yawn), Simpson focuses on the lives, attitudes and philosophies of eight subjects, whose views—Simpson says—embody the powerful cleavages of our time: NAFTA and Free Trade supporter Derek Bumeby, equality rights advocate and Charter of Rights enthusiast Mary Eberts, Reform leader Preston Manning, Trudeau federalist and Newfoundland Premier Clyde Wells, aboriginal leader Georges Erasmus, Saint Ste. Marie Mayor Joe Fratesi, Bloc leader Lucien Bouchard, and "tired federalist" Laval professor Leon Dion.

Simpson's portraits of these figures are vivid and interesting. During the course of the book we learn, not only about the philosophical attitudes of each person, but also about their own individual characters. Stylistically, Simpson attempts to chronicle these people and their points of view, while at the same time providing an historical and ideological background. The result is concise narrative and periods of long—but eminently readable and compelling—direct quotations, combined with regular morsels of detailed contextual material.

The chapters on Burney, Eberts, Fratesi, Erasmus, Dion and Wells all succeed admirably in getting across Simpson's theme of the traditional expectations imposed on her results in her alienation. But there were many guests at the albatross reunion who were less inclined to make allowances, and though Juliet was indifferent to their disapproval she was to learn, over the years, that a small town has subtle and sometimes vicious ways of not forgiving deviations from the norm.

Of the contemporary writers in the anthology, many have ventured into the darker side of Kingston life in their semi-fictional works. A poem by Bronwen Wallace reveals the grittier side of the city, as does an excerpt from Judith Thompson's play The Crack Walker. "Myrna at the A & P" recounts the life of a lonely writer, trapped by the backwardness of a small-city mentality.

There are also gems from Steve Heigham, Queen's professor Elizabeth Greene, Mat Cohen, Irving Layton, Al Purdy, Booker Prize nominee Carol Shields and Kingston's own Tom Marshall.

Besides spanning more than 150 years of Kingston life and portraying a diversity of perceptions, Written in Stone also encompasses many different genres of writing: plays, poetry, fiction, journals and diaries. But much of the strength of the anthology comes from its proximity to the hearts of all those who have a link to Kingston. Whether you are a lifetime resident, a visitor, or a part of one of the many institutions, Written in Stone will no doubt speak directly to you about places in Kingston that you know and remember, about the feelings that this small but textured city can evoke. This is the power of the compilation—that all these things which we hold dear are seen in a much wider context, from their historical origins to their modern-day transformations.

chapter, but can be found in explicit and implicit ways.

By far and away, the most interesting chapter of the book, however, is Simpson's treatment of Bloc leader Bouchard. Here, to a far greater extent than for others, there appears to be a grudging admiration and sense of respect for Bouchard. Simpson quotes Bouchard directly at great lengths, allowing readers to get a real sense of the man and his politics. Profiling Bouchard's role in then Leader of the Opposition Brian Mulroney's infamous 1984 "with honour and enthusiasm" speech—which promised a new constitutional deal for Quebec—we get a real sense of how and why this friend of the Prime Minister went from being a Parti Quebecois-supporting independantiste to federal Cabinet Minister to (oxymoron of oxymorons) federal souverainiste leader. With so little substantive English-language writing on Bouchard and the Bloc, Faultlines becomes a must-read for the Canadian politics die-hard.

It's worth noting that Simpson has received criticism from some quarters for not adequately challenging the statements and attitudes of some of his subjects, most notably Manning and Bouchard. But tackling these people's ideologies and philosophies isn't Simpson's purpose. With the exception of a few (more or less) latent jabs here and there, Simpson acts merely as a messenger. It's up to you to make the judgments. Instead Simpson injects his own thoughts (wise and thoughtful, as usual) in a cogent eleven-page introduction and a frank and forthright fifteen-page conclusion.

In the end, Faultlines more than succeeds in its purpose of identifying and interpreting the different ideological strands in Canadian society that have so divided us during the past decade. We can only hope that with Simpson's success at bringing these divisions into the open and giving them a personal face, an understanding of sorts—leading perhaps to national reconciliation—may begin.

X.

She stands where the X marks the spot
 And peers at me through a metal bar
 You don't have time for that, she scorns
 You won't go very far

You have things to do
 And books to overcome
 You're wasting your time
 You're not going to be anyone

Scornfully she laughs
 From her objective little cell
 And carries on with her conformity
 And praises her tangible hell

Pity fills my heart
 As I watch her imprisoned soul
 Living in a world of false reality
 The truth—the dominant X stole

In my preferred place
 I ignore her conformist calls
 And hungrily chase true dreams
 Down subjective and empty halls.

FRANK & EARNEST Gaels face stark reality — beat McGill or miss playoffs

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal
All the time-worn clichés apply for the Queen's Golden Gaels in tomorrow's Homecoming game against the McGill Redmen at Richardson Stadium.

'93 Gaels a mystery

Backs to the wall, do or die, there's no tomorrow, it's never over 'til it's over, and the like. There's no escaping this painfully obvious fact: Unless the Vanier Cup champion Gaels win, they will miss the playoffs for the first time since 1976, Doug Hargreaves' first year as head coach.

The question everyone on campus is asking is, "How can this team be so bad, so soon after being so good?" There is really no single explanation — graduation, injuries and rivals' improvements have all contributed to the Gaels' 2-4 record. But offensive coordinator Bob Howes hit the nail on the head when he said, "Too many people on this team figured Queen's could just show up and win games this year. The fact is, we're not good enough to do that."

Howes was specifically referring to last weekend's 34-12 loss to the Ottawa Gee-Gees. Simply put, the Gaels were brutal in the first half, in which they could not cross midfield, much less mount a scoring threat. The undernourished Queen's offense is only averaging 16 points per game, and seems to have gone on the Ultra Slim-Fast program, with only ONE rushing touchdown in six games. But here's the strange part: The Gaels are SECOND in the six-team OQIFC in both yards gained and yards allowed, yet they can't put the ball in the endzone themselves, nor stop opponents from doing the same. Queen's ranks FIRST in passing defense!

Paul Kozaan leads the conference in both receptions (27) and receiving yards (482). That's the best season by a Queen's receiver since Jock Climie in 1989.

TSN will cover game

Despite starting QB Steve Othen's struggles and backup Rob Weir's strong performance in the second half, Howes downplayed any quarterback controversy. "If Steve is healthy, he's proven he can do the job," Howes said. "But on Saturday, he started with a dislocated finger on his non-throwing hand, and took a hard hit which led to a strained groin. Besides, it's not just the quarterback who deserves the blame — we were bad as a team. There was no intensity whatsoever. This game just doesn't allow you to do that and win."

Queen's has yet to win at home this season. But they will have a probable sellout Homecoming crowd of 12,000 cheering them on, as well as national television coverage from both TSN and RDS. It's the biggest sporting event of the year at Queen's — perhaps the Gaels will rise to the occasion in a must-win situation.

McGill is coming off a very convincing 28-5 win over the previously-unbeaten Bishop's Gaiters. The Redmen (3-3) must also win to make the playoffs, so there will be no love lost in this latest renewal of a rivalry which began 106 years ago. The Gaels have won the last seven meetings dating back to 1988, and there is nobody currently on the Queen's roster who has ever lost to McGill. But the Redmen were the team that gave the Gaels the most trouble on last season's march to the Vanier Cup, as Queen's just barely prevailed 24-21 when an apparent last-minute McGill touchdown was called back. The Redmen certainly remember that game very well.

Elberg still questionable

All-Canadian tailback Brad Elberg may not be ready to play tomorrow. Elberg has a strained ankle ligament which hasn't responded quickly. The slow-healing injury, suffered against Concordia on Oct. 2, has kept him out of the last two games. Even if Elberg does manage to ignore the pain and take the field, how effective can he be, given that three weeks of training have been lost?

Tomorrow could be the last game for many stalwart veterans, including Ed Kidd, Dan McCullough, Mark Robinson and possibly Elberg and Kozaan as well.

A special pre-game ceremony, beginning 10 minutes before game time, will honour coaching icon Frank Tindall, who coached Queen's for 29 years from 1948-1975.

Mix Queen's Gold and McGill Red and what do you get but Halloween Orange, which matches the colour of the leaves these days! It's going to be a barnburner. This writer is too nervous and apprehensive to venture any predictions. Let's just hope the real Golden Gaels show up.

BY GEOFF OWEN
The Queen's Journal

Can Queen's repeat a Vanier run? In 1902, the McGill Redmen stunned the football world by winning the Yates Cup 10-1 over the previously unbeaten Queen's Golden Gaels.

In 1960, McGill had gone 22 years without winning the Yates Cup. They were an undersized group who really had no business reaching the football championship against the first-place Gaels. The Redmen, fuelled by determination and fear, shut out the Gaels 21-0 to take home the championship.

In 1962, the Redmen, showing no respect for Queen's University, the Queen's Golden Gaels or tradition at Queen's, marched into old Richardson Stadium and again took home the Yates Cup 15-13, on Homecoming weekend in Kingston.

In 1981, Queen's handed McGill one of their most painful losses in the latter's history. The Redmen went undefeated over the course of the regular season and held a 16-1 halftime lead over the visiting Golden Gaels. The Gaels mounted a second-half comeback on the strength of some nifty running by running backs Larry Mohr and Bob Bronk (272 yards combined) and the quarterbacking savvy of back-up Peter Harrison. McGill went down 26-19.

In 1983, perhaps the most exciting Queen's-McGill game took place. The underdog Redmen stormed out in front for a 23-14 halftime lead. Again, however, Queen's put together a valiant second half come back to take a 33-27 into the waning moments of the game. But with no time left on the clock, McGill completed a 36-yard touchdown pass and then split the uprights with the game-winning convert.

In 1987, the Gaels lost 27-24 in the OQIFC semi-final game at McGill. The significance of the loss, however, transcended playoff disappointment. It marked the first time in 85 years that the Gaels had lost a playoff game in Montreal. The Queen's game was the first of four consecutive victories for the McGill Redmen, who went on to win the Vanier Cup that year.

In 1988, Gaels' quarterback Tim Pendergast hit All-Canadian receiver Jock Climie for a seven-yard touchdown strike with only 48 seconds remaining in the game to give Queen's a 31-28 victory.

In 1989, the famous "fog bowl", Pendergast hit Climie and Doug Corbett for two fourth-quarter touchdowns. Furthermore, bulldozer halfback Paul Beresford ran for 213 yards and crossed the goal line twice. Queen's scored 31 unanswered points when the fog lifted to win 33-17.

In 1992, in the OQIFC semi-final game, the Redmen came within a clipping call of eliminating the Golden Gaels. The Gaels pulled off the victory, however, winning 24-21. The McGill game was the first of four consecutive victories for the Gaels who went on to win the Vanier Cup last year.

This year's Homecoming game, history shows, holds a great deal of significance. Queen's must win to make the playoffs; McGill will need significant help in order to play a week from Saturday if they lose.

The Queen's-McGill rivalry has been defined by outstanding individual performances and dramatic comebacks in key games. Indeed, McGill University and Queen's University have a relationship that epitomizes the word "rivalry". The two schools are among the oldest and most academically elite schools in the nation. In addition, they have been competing against each other for 106 years and have played 165 times (Queen's leads the series 93-67-5). On the line for the Gaels is a 16-year playoff streak. Not since Doug Hargreaves' first season have the Gaels failed to make the playoffs. That is the longest stretch for any team in CIAU history.

Moreover, this could very likely be the last home game for Doug Hargreaves against McGill, as he plans to retire after next season.

The results of the 1993 Queen's-McGill game may be of little interest to anybody in 15 years. It may pale in comparison to the games played in 1902, 1962, or 1983. It cannot be forgotten, however, how hard the players and coaches have worked since the middle of August. It is entirely possible that the Gaels will lose on the weekend and thus end their 16-year streak. But for football players, however, the game of football is not about historical significance. It is about dedication and determination. It is about getting your block knocked off and knocking somebody else's off. It is about practising when it's 30 degrees out and when it's -5 degrees. It is about rivalries and friendships. But most of all, it is about winning. This Saturday, the 1993 Gaels will find their own little niche in history. But they are not playing for the past, they are playing for the right to play next week.

Queen's soccer women 1st in East

BY MAG SMITH
The Queen's Journal

The Queen's women's soccer Gaels have established themselves as the best team in the Eastern division of the OWIAA, thanks to their victories over York and Ryerson last weekend. The Gaels are ranked third nationally for the second straight week.

On Saturday, Queen's met Ryerson in Toronto, the result of which was a 7-0 win. The Gaels were particularly proud of "girl with panties on head" who delivered a crowd-pleasing assist to rookie Caleigh Sullivan.

On Sunday, the intensity of play increased tenfold, as Queen's met York, the division leaders. As moms looked on, and coaches paced, Queen's set out to show York how to play ball with class.

Indeed, the Queen's squad did make the York team look shameful, and took control from the start. Hero Laurie Thomson was a menacing presence on the back line, as she managed to dance through the York line-up to cross an assist in the offensive third. Martha Hall finished Laurie's pass with an explosive goal which turned out to be the only one of the game.

The Gaels' defensive line was impenetrable. Jen Lawetz, Laurie

Thomson and Monica Howard shut things down at the back, while Caleigh Sullivan guarded her check so relentlessly that the York player asked to be taken off. Rookie goalie Dawn Dell'Agnesse dazzled spectators with her combination of aggressiveness and agility.

The team played with heart, and they all deserve to be commended on their outstanding play. The 1-0 win put Queen's in first place, and another 1-0 victory over Carleton on Thursday has solidified this position. With only three games left in the regular season, it looks like Queen's will finish on top!

Road Warriors! The men's hockey team opened the season with two impressive road wins last weekend. The Gaels posted a convincing 7-2 victory over Ryerson on Friday night, and followed with a 4-2 triumph over Laurentian in Sudbury the next day.

In Toronto, the team dominated the third period by scoring five goals while limiting Ryerson to one. Game MVP Mike Lobinowich had two goals and two assists while Ryan Kantautas added three points. Other goal scorers included Bill Budgeell, Kenny Robbins, Andrew Clark and Shannon Storr.

The Gaels defeated Laurentian with help from four different goal-scorers. Ryan Kantautas concluded a great weekend by getting the game-winning goal. Jeff "Goose" Gosselin, Paul de Verteuil, and rookie defenseman Mike Longo added singles.

Veteran netminder Bill Landry played well in both games, especially in the first game, where he stopped Ryerson cold.

Head coach John Phelan was impressed with the team's performance on the weekend. "Two wins on the road is good for the team, especially considering Laurentian's talent," Phelan said. "It was a total team effort, with 11 goals scored by 9 players."

Queen's cruised to victory with a fast-paced, physical forechecking game. Look for the same type of action at their home-opener this weekend! The Gaels are geared up to crunch the Concordia Stingers. Queen's women take the gold and then get 'banned'! Ray-banned that is!

At last weekend's Bousch and Lomb invitational in Rochester, New York, in addition to winning gold medals, crews also received free Ray Ban sunglasses. The Rochester regatta marks the first time Queen's crews have rowed internationally (O.K. — just across the border) this fall. At Rochester, they met many talented Ivy League crews (some races had up to 30 entries) from many of the best universities. The Rochester race is unique because it is composed of two parts: the winning crew must have the best overall time after racing in a three-mile head race followed by a shorter sprint.

The women's lightweight eight proved their strength by taking a gold medal for the first time this season. The crew remained second after the head race but seized the gold after a strong performance in the sprint. The Queen's women's lightweight eight crew members are Julie Mahoney, Claire Netherington, Stacey Mitchell, Andrea Koster, Hannah Timbers, Kirstie McAllister, Stacey Ivanchuk, Jen Hegan and cox Steph Bertels. The crew is coached by head coach John Armitage.

Through the miserable weather and traps of floating leaves, the Queen's crews battled for gold and in most cases were only beaten by a few short seconds.

The men's heavy eight had a strong head race, placing sixth, but dropped to tenth place after a disappointing sprint. The women's heavy four and women's lightweight four both had strong races and ranked fourth.

The men's lightweight four of Brett Seifred, Chris Langehead, Greg Fenton, Nick Smith and cox Karen Hall, placed second to Cornell after a tight race.

The women's heavy eight met fierce competition in an open category. They ranked 6th in the head race, and seventh overall. The men's lightweight eight had this same result.

The Varsity development 'A' crew had great races, placing fourteenth overall, competing in an open varsity race.

This weekend, the Queen's crew divides. Queen's will be represented at McGill and a few select crews will travel to Boston to race in the famous Head of the Charles regatta.

The days of our youth are the days of our glory"

—Lord Byron

Youth runneth over for the men's volleyballers this season. A team comprised of only two vets, fourth-year captain Ron O'Hare and another senior — starting setter Kevin Chiswell, is usually known as being in a rebuilding year. Wrong.

When the youth includes sophomores like 6'9" middle-blocker, David Kantor, (converted from last year's setting role), and team MVP middle-man, Mike 'Steadfast' Spence, rebuilding isn't a prospect — demolishing the opponents is.

Playing last weekend in their first competition of the season, the five-team Queen's Invitational, the Golden crew came up a little short as Kantor sat the bench with a pulled pectoral after playing the first game of the semi-final. Waterloo took full advantage of the absence of the all-star Canada Games athlete and advanced into the final 3-1 (10-15, 15-11, 16-14, 15-1), only to be walked over by Victoria.

"I wish we had a chance to play Queen's in the final, said Victoria head coach, Paul Smith. "I know our boys would have been more motivated against them."

With the help of Spence, the Gaels demonstrated that they could prevail even with Kantor taking stats as they downed last year's CIAU silver-medalists, the Montreal Carabins, by the bronze 3-1 (15-10, 15-10, 12-15, 16-14).

Montreal was competing without national team prospect Simon Berleur (who reportedly is in no position to miss study time) and another AWOL middle hitter from last year's line-up. Former Olympic team assistant coach, Julien Boucher, who has taken over the Montreal head coach role this season, expects to be ranked higher than Queen's once his stronger line-up is back together.

The Gaels aren't much worried over the results of this tournament. With a full schedule of over 70 matches including a Christmas tour of California, Queen's hopes to peak at play-off time. The Gaels will have to claw it out again in the OUAA East against Toronto and York to gain a berth in the national finals.

What about the big gun in the middle, you say? Not to worry, Kantor's absence is temporary, said Queen's head coach, Brenda Willis. Willis recently coached Kantor and his Canada Games teammates to Ontario's first volleyball gold medal in Kamloops, B.C.

"He said it didn't hurt when he was hitting or blocking," said Willis. "But it was sore when he would breathe, so we sat him out as a precaution."

Pre-caution (pri-ko'shen) 1. Something opponents calling Queen's 'a rebuilding team' should use.

Queen's will hold an alumni match tomorrow night in the athletic center at 6 p.m.

Foreboding: the fear that something is not quite right with the universe and it's all going to come crashing down on you.

Yep, the universe sure is one screwy place. Not only can billion dollar NASA missions be scrubbed because someone forgot to pay the long distance cellular bill but apparently ConEd can win at Ultimate Frisbee. Sure, it is ConEd, the team that seems to own championships in every co-ed sport known to humankind, but it still should not have happened. I mean every woman on the team is short. S.H.O.R.T. Not a big plus in Ultimate. Sure, they can run and throw with the best of them, but catch those high floaters, no way. Yet the ConEd's won. In big championship form over Loose Moose this past weekend. What does this tell us? Despite my best efforts, I am not the next coming of Nostradamus, and Intramurals had better quit adding new BEWIC (co-ed) sports before those ConEd's run out of storage space for those championship shirts.

Coming up next week is the managers' meeting for BEWIC Curling. That's Wed. Oct. 27 at 6 p.m. in room 206 of the PEC. Bring embers (2 men, 2 women) and a $40 bond (MISC shag tapes are completely optional).

Also next week are W/Catholics Starting Sunday, begin counting your laps and circuits on the W/C board.

Athlete of the week

This week's Athlete of the Week goes to Queen's men's soccer striker Ken Butler. Ken is a second-year Physical Education student and first-year Gael from Oakville.

During Queen's 9-0 victory over Trent on Oct. 13, Butler scored five points. Anyone remotely familiar with soccer knows that getting one goal in a game is a feat in itself, but five? Congratulations, Ken! The team next plays on Sunday, Oct. 24, vs. Ryerson.

Gaels rugby seconds are second to none

BY ROB THOMPSON
The Queen's Journal

It's trivia time: Which Golden Gaels varsity team has had the most success over the past seven years? If you answered football... you're way off. In fact, the team with the best record over that time span is the rugby seconds. This is a team that over the past seven years has dropped only three games. This is a team that over the past seven years has won six championships. And this may be the team with the least recognition in the Queen's athletic program.

"Who are the rugby seconds?", you may ask. They are a group of athletes who serve as reserves for the first team. Due to the specialized nature of rugby's positions, as well as the physical nature of the game, it is essential that a team carry a full complement of reserves. Hence the necessity for a second team. The seconds do not just warm the bench the firsts come game time, however. They play a full league and playoff schedule.

The seconds are able to gain the most valuable form of experience: game experience. Unlike other varsity sports, where the substitutes wait for a rare opportunity to step into the field, the rugby seconds are constantly benefiting from the experience gained by playing every week. In most cases, by the time the players graduate to the first team they have had one to two years of experience at the interuniversity level.

A common assumption about the rugby seconds is that they are merely the cuts from the first team. This is not the case. This season over 90 people tried out for Queen's varsity rugby. Only the top 30 were assigned to a team. Even limiting the numbers to 30 was a difficult task for the coaching staff. Coach Ferguson said he had enough quality players to carry four teams — a strong indication of the depth and quality of Queen's rugby.

Not only do the seconds serve as a set of reserves for the first squad, but they are also a feeder team. In past years, as many as thirteen of the fifteen firsts players have spent at least one year on the seconds. This year holds true to form, as many standouts have worked their way up through the seconds program. Players like Drew McNaughton, Ben Andrews, Sebastian Orsi, and Mike Armstrong, to name only a few, all played at least a year on the second team.

In perhaps the strongest testament to the strength of the Queen's rugby program, Kevin O'Shea, who recently returned from representing Ontario at the National Rugby Championships, served two years on the seconds before graduating to the firsts. Coach Ferguson firmly believes that the tremendous success that has been attained by the first team is directly attributable to the second team. If asked to name an MVP for his team, he wouldn't single out an individual, instead he would chose to highlight the entire second unit.

If you've ever walked by Kingston Field in the early evening, you have seen both the first and second squads practising. You would be hard-pressed to identify two different teams, however. For all intents and purposes, there is only one team practising. Each man runs through the same battery of drills. There is no aura of superiority on behalf of the firsts towards the seconds, and there is definitely no preferential treatment on the part of Coach Ferguson to either team. Not only do the two teams practice and train together, but they travel together, and after the game, they descend upon Dr. Girdy's together. They are one cohesive unit.

The calibre of play on the Queen's seconds team leaves little to be desired. This year they stand at the top of the league with a 6-0 slate, as they head into this afternoon's final game of the season against McMaster in Hamilton. They will then advance into the playoffs seeking their seventh title in eight years. Many of the top players on the Queen's second team, such as captain John Coffeng and Richard Child, would certainly shine on any other first team in the conference. Coach Ferguson added that the Gaels' second squad as a whole would be very competitive in the first division.

The rugby seconds represent everything that is great about Queen's — excellence, strength, and dedication. If there is a team that deserves the support of the student body, it's this one. In a year in which the campus attitude towards athletics is apathetic at best, there are no excuses for not taking in the

Both teams should finish the year in first place and will host playoff games. So next Saturday, when the football Gaels are on the road, walk by Kingston Field and stick around for a while. Ask any of the thousands of frosh who were there seven weeks ago — Queen's rugby is second to none.

The Queen's field hockey team travelled to Montreal this past weekend to compete in yet another exciting trio of games at Molson Stadium. Having had a disappointing loss in their Thanksgiving-week game against McGill, the Gaels are eager to redeem themselves and escape the rut they had seemingly fallen into.

The first game of the weekend took place on a beautiful Saturday morning against York. Although York ranks a strong second within the division, as they have for several years, the Gaels came out undaunted by this status and determined to win. The game was face-paced and exciting as both teams struggled to take the lead.

York scored first, but the Gaels rebounded almost immediately with a stunning goal from rookie Louise Barclay. Inspired by Barclay's goal, the Gaels played with unrivalled intensity and held the Yeowomen to a tie for the majority of the game. Unfortunately, however, York managed to slip through the Queen's defense late in the second half to score the game-winning goal. Although the Gaels felt they had deserved a tie, the team was pleased with the intensity and teamwork which had emerged on the field, which had clearly lifted them out of their slump.

The Gaels' next game was against the Toronto Blues and came almost immediately after the York game, thus proving to be both a painful and exhausting experience. Although the Gaels struggled valiantly, they soon broke under U of T's constant and relentless pressure, losing the game after a barrage of Blues goals.

On Sunday morning, Queen's encountered Trent for the last game of their weekend. Although the Gaels started off slowly, a well-deserved goal by Karen Natho revived the team and the Gaels quickly came to dominate the play. Queen's ended up winning the game by a score of 6-0, with the remaining goals scored by Julia Barss (who scored twice), Usha Kakaria, Jillian Boyd, and Louise Barclay.

Although the Gaels came out of the weekend with only one win, the team was pleased with their performance and were inspired with new confidence for their upcoming games.

While many students headed home for turkey, Thanksgiving weekend, a small group of dedicated varsity fencers made the long haul to London to compete at the 39th annual London Heroes competition.

Due to the restructuring of the United States Fencing Association (USFA), American fencers must enter Canadian competitions in order to be considered for selection to the U.S. Olympic teams. Consequently, there were many top American fencers from Penn State, Notre Dame, Rochester, and from as far away as Kentucky. Coupled with some of the top Canadian athletes in the sport, London presented its strongest competition in many years.

In the women's foil event on Saturday, Sue Myong, the sole Queen's entrant, overcame the adversity of injury to finish 19th. The event was won by a former U.S. junior national champion.

The men's event in epee attracted a large turnout of 76 fencers. Andreas Wild and Dave Arthurs from the Queen's epee team both placed solidly in the middle of the pack. The overall event winner fences for the Czech national team.

The final event of the day was sabre. In the men's competition, James Wilson finished 8th overall, Queen's best result. Team members Henk Pardoe and Steve Cobham finished close behind at 10th and 13th, respectively. The event was won by Robert Fallenbuch, the Canadian national champion.

In the women's competition, Sarah Woodrow placed third out of eight entrants. Women's sabre is only in its second year of development at the national level.

On the Sunday, the remaining events in men's foil and women's epee were held. In men's foil, Kristjan Leasson placed 21st out of a field of 64, which included many of the top U.S. foilists.

In women's epee, two Queen's women, who chose to remain anonymous, competed against a very strong field, stacked with the top 20 Americans and top 20 Canadians. However, it is a certain bet that these two (we know who you are) will recover in time for the annual Queen's Homecoming Tournament. It will be held on Oct. 23-24 in the Bews Gym. Participants are expected from clubs all over Ontario to join us in one of the largest individual participation circuit tournaments this season.

The Queen's men's basketball team opened their exhibition season last Friday with an 80-69 win over a good Durham College team in Bartlett Gym. Mike Ruscitti led the Gaels' attack with 25 points, while Roger Wheeler nailed 13. The 1993-94 Gaels are laden with rookies who seem to look like head coach Larry Smith (at least from the neck up).

Leading CIAU scorer Dave Martz is currently sidelined with a rib and rib injuries, but could return within a month. The Gaels are working to raise money for their New Year's trip to Hawaii, where they will play in a round-robin with five other teams. Women's volleyball Gaels 5th

BY CORI SCHMITZ
The Queen's Journal

This past weekend, the men's and women's varsity volleyball Gaels hosted their seventh annual invitational tournament. The women's pool consisted of teams from Toronto, Sherbrooke College, Carleton, Western, Concordia and our own Golden Gaels. The team put on a solid performance, adjusting well to their new system of defense, and placed fifth.

The women played in six best-of-three matches over the course of the weekend. The combined efforts of three veteran stars - middle blocker Kathrin Schumacher, technique Julie Martindale and setter Dana Mendham - spear-headed the Gaels' attack. The rookies and other returning players each saw substantial court time, and their consistent play demonstrated the potential and future strength of the Queen's team.

The team's true abilities were demonstrated in tough losses to Sherbrooke (15-9, 15-17, 4-15), and Western (12-15, 16-14, 11-15). Julie Martindale lead the attack in both matches, with 7 and 15 kills respectively. Vet Marie Roberts and rookie Janice Rickard contributed in the Western match by passing more serves than the rest of the players combined!

Sally Thomas, a former technique, proved her versatility by sliding easily into her new role as power hitter with high kill and serve passing percentages in all sets.

This weekend, the women's team is off to McGill for their second tournament and the first of four road trips in the coming month. It will be a developmental first half of the season for the Gaels. This team possesses a lot of depth in skills and spirit. We should see considerable improvement in their abilities over the course of the year.

Thanks to all who came out and supported the team's efforts!

Deadlock at Toronto

BY DAN MCNAIR
The Queen's Journal

With a playoff position assured, all that is left for the Queen's Golden Gaels men's soccer team is to decide whether they will finish third or fourth in the OUAA this season.

Queen's travelled to Toronto last Saturday to meet the Toronto Varsity Blues at Varsity Stadium. The weather presented some difficult conditions for both teams to contend with, as the field was wet and extremely slippery. The conditions suited neither team, because both sides' games are characterized by high levels of skill and control. As a result, the game became a battle as the two squads vied for every loose ball which the slick surface introduced.

Queen's rookie goalkeeper Liam Stevenson was called upon to make some fine stops throughout the game, including a brave challenge against Toronto striker Tom Kuzmanis that left the young keeper dazed from the resulting clash. That, however, was the only scoring opportunity the prolific Toronto striker would be afforded, as rookie defender Rich Price was very effective in denying him further chances of reaching the back of the Queen's goal.

Queen's stoppers Rick Boomgaardt and Brendan Johnson had outstanding games, as they aptly dealt with any threat from the air that the Varsity Blues presented.

The Toronto defence also performed adequately, often coming to the rescue of their CIAU All-star keeper Tim Rosenfeld, whose performance on the day was generally shaky. The Toronto defenders were equal to the performances of their counterparts, as they effectively shut down Queen's strikers Ken Butler and Jonathan Soler.

Although both teams had chances to score, the majority of the chances were in Queen's favour. But no one was able to capitalize, and the game ended in a scoreless draw.

In all likelihood Queen's will finish fourth in the league because of a 2-1 Laurentian win over Trent. The Gaels' next game against Ryerson on Sunday is essentially academic, since Ryerson has been eliminated by the mathematical impossibility of catching Queen's.

It is highly probable that Queen's will meet Carleton in the OUAA semi-finals. That game would carry extra weight because of the heart-wrenching semi-final loss the Gaels suffered last year in the dying seconds of overtime. It's a loss that none of the veterans have forgotten, and everyone on the team is eager to avenge.

Golden Gaels, Golden Arches host Tindall hoops tourney

The Queen's Journal

The Queen's Golden Gaels and the McDonald's Golden Arches join forces next week to honour Frank Tindall's 27 years as head coach of Queen's men's basketball teams from 1949 to 1975 in the fifth annual Frank Tindall - McDonald's Men's Invitational Basketball Tournament.

The event begins at 6:00 p.m. Friday, Oct. 29 when the Laurier Golden Hawks face the Bishop's Gaitsers. Game two starts at 8:00 p.m. with the Queen's Golden Gaels hosting the University of New Brunswick RedShirts.

Action continues on Saturday with the losers from both games playing in the consolation final at 6:00 p.m. This will be followed by the championship game at 8:00 p.m.

All games will be held at the Bartley Gymnasium. Admission is free with your student card. Come out and cheer the Gaels to victory!

A foot-shuffling experience

The Shuffle Demons
Alfie's
BY MOLLY FINLAY
The Queen's Journal

The last time I had the opportunity to hear The Shuffle Demons was in the musically naive blur of a grade ten semi-formal. Unsure as to what these strange characters with assorted degrees of facial hair were creating with their various wind instruments, my untrained ears detected some sort of eclectic jazz sound. While my musical intuition or apprehension has not matured over the past seven years, the sounds of the bizarre and fantastic Shuffle Demons have developed into quite an incredible musical experience.

The band is comprised of Richard Underhill, David Parker, Perry White, Mike Milligan, and Stich Wynston. They have been together for nine years now, having met in the Toronto jazz scene. The Alfie's show on Wednesday night was extremely strong, despite the crowd dampening effect of a World Series game and impending mid-terms (mid-burns?). The Shuffle Demons drew a loyal gathering of listeners, who partook in some quite zany dancing in the largely empty pub.

The quintet played some material from their new album Extra Crispy (which is on their own independent label, "Stubby" Records). Notable tunes from this new album are "Deli Tray," "Funkin' Pumpkin," "Band That Wouldn't Leave," and "Party Down." Their second set consisted of some of their older songs, such as "Cheese on Bread," and "Spadina Bus" in which the band led a caravan of twenty patrons into the mens' washroom.

Needless to say, The Shuffle Demons are able to energize even a small venue and convert their listeners to their own "fly by the seat of their pants mentality." The Wednesday night concert was their fifth or sixth show at Queen's, where they have always enjoyed success.

While in Kingston this time around, The Shuffle Demons also led a musical workshop at a local high school. The Shuffle Demons prefer not to be pigeon-holed into one particular genre. Their influences are obviously found in jazz, funk, blues, soul, and rock (during the second set Mike played a rock 'n' roll bass solo which was technically awesome and aurally mesmerizing). David Parker stated tongue in cheek that The Shuffle Demons were "New Age" music. Despite their wide array of styles, The Shuffle Demons feel that perhaps some people consider their music to be weird and on the fringe. The Shuffle Demons hope to expand their audience, using their alternative, international appeal. The Shuffle Demons are certainly able to reach this ideal audience, as a result of their skilful and completely appealing sound.

The Shuffle Demons aim to entertain their audience and create an energy between the musician and listener. Their music inspires movement and laughter, which is amplified by their wacky stage style. Richard Underhill, lead vocalist and saxophone player (as well as the now sole goatie wearer in the band), states The Shuffle Demons' simple mandate: "we want to be ambassadors of fun."

Two saxxy Shuffle Demons.

The Enthusiasm of the Species Written and Directed by Michael McMurtry
The Baby Grand Theatre
BY DARRYL WHETTER
The Queen's Journal

Watching Michael McMurtry's one-man play The Enthusiasm of the Species is like watching a moving subway. A lot of characters flash by and your brain doesn't know exactly what to make of them. But, of course, I'm lying. It's not a subway, it's a slick piece of theatre from a lightning-quick mind.

McMurtry, a Queen's Drama graduate, is the writer/director/actor of this one-man show that made critics swoon at Toronto's latest Fringe Festival. The hour-and-a-quarter show has spartan lighting, a single chair for the set, and only one tiny prop (I won't give it away - treat yourself for $8).

"Now, in this particular moment, billions of people don't know that I exist - that is your fate." So opens McMurtry's seamless montage of running characters and shifting themes. He volleys Western culture's "imperviousness to information" between a Polish immigrant woman and an American mid-Western contented under-achiever. Before you can blink (hell, before he can blink) he's a prudish English intellectual pontificating about homelessness with a homosexual actor with a penchant for armchair psychoanalysis. McMurtry doesn't just talk about the political spectrum, he becomes it.

While leaving these different character pots boiling, McMurtry cooks up a composite thematic stew, the self-described "Amazing Emotional Diet." He cat-and-mouses with the audience, ranging from intimate to intimidating. At this one-man show, the audience is always slapped by the hand that feeds them. McMurtry is jovial during audience participation, confiding when he lapses out of script, and brutally confrontational when the mood strikes him (or one of the hinds). Like one character states, "I may be abrasive, but honesty's abrasive."

The instantaneous changes in accent, stance, and intonation which account for the seamlessness of Enthusiasm, are almost too good to let us see the master craftsmanship beneath. Almost.

Enthusiasm's speeding bullet pace and spiralling characterization allow McMurtry to be aphoristic without sounding contrived. Questions such as "If everybody relates to Holden Caulfield, who are the fake people he's talking about?" tend to have a more difficult time staying afloat in naturalistic theatre. In McMurtry's case, these beautifully-woven strands are palpable by themselves, while contributing to a larger thematic web.

McMurtry also capitalizes on the obvious meta-theatricality of a one-man show, merging self-referential craft into his thematic framework. McMurtry has the courage to ask himself the big question that his creation begs: "Just because I'm talking, does that mean somebody has to listen?" That question, like McMurtry the actor, has as many answers as it does layers.

Enthusiasm, the amorphous wonder that it is, suffers from two slight problems. McMurtry's seamless characterization occasionally lapses into caricature. The homosexual actor who knows too much pop psychology appears, at times, to be an unfortunate cliché in a catalogue of genuine characters. More significantly, Enthusiasm suffers from a slightly decadent thematic myopia. The recurrent glances at different themes begin to demand a greater examination which isn't always delivered.

In the end, McMurtry tucks each character away while reminding us of the monsters under the bed. Enthusiasm may not provide many answers, but neither does life and we still cling to it like savages.

The Enthusiasm of the Species is on at 8:00 PM tonight at the Baby Grand Theatre. Advance tickets are on sale at the Grand Theatre Box Office.

Highlights of Years Past, When Alumni Weekend Was Still Homecoming

BY IAN PETRIE and ROB FURSE
The Queen's Journal

For we entertainment types, Homecoming (Alumni Weekend for you P.C. types), invariably means more than keg parties and bloodshot eyes. Although we still enjoy these, our attention is focused on the annual cavalcade of entertainment events which are the highlight of the festivities. This year's concert at Jock Hardy, featuring the Stonecutters, Eric's Trip and the Pursuit of Happiness, will no doubt be a fine evening in and of itself, but it does bear the burden of tradition. Thus, a quick tour... er, retrospective (better Scrabble word) of past Homecoming highlights.

A walk on the wild side

1974. Not just Lou Reed. Lou Reed with platinum blonde hair. How stylish. Imagine what it was like hearing the man belt out "Heroin" when he looked like he was (and probably was) still using it. His set also featured "White Light, White Heat," "Sweet Jane," and "Walk on the Wild Side" - hmmm, sounds like that greatest hits album to me. Journal reporter Paul Luke described Reed as a "gaunt homosexual facsimile"... today, that would be "gaunt homosexual fax." A then-unknown Hall & Oates were the much-reviled opening act. Oddly enough, Luke complained of their decibel level, eulogizing the band as "a good pick-up band for Edgar Winter when he's too wrecked to be discriminating." Yeah, right. And like Paul Luke wasn't singin' along a few years later to "I Can't Go For

That (No Can Do)," "Maneater," and "Private Eyes."

Carlin no critics darlin'

1976. First-class comedy came to Jock Harty (spelt "Jock Hardy" in the ads) in the person of potty-mouthed future Bill and Ted adviser George Carlin. Journal contributor Shelagh Hurley was in a decidedly puritan mood, complaining about Carlin's beer guzzling, and then griping about having to pay $5.50 for her ticket - and for an uncomfortable seat as well! Of course, no one had invented those

Anyone who has seen the band's outfits on its albums of the time can imagine what a lush visual spectacle this show must have been. Journal hack Brent Lavictoire obviously fit the stereotype, as he was no less than lovin' the power trio's renditions of all of Hemispheres, most of Farewell to Kings and a handful of cuts from 2112... what, no "By-Tor and the Snow Dog"? (On the same page as this review, Dollar Bill's Show Palace demonstrated its wacky, post-One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest sense of humour with the catchy slogan "I'd rather have a bottle in front of me than a frontal lobotomy.") Their featured act that week was "Blues and Rock artist" David Wilcox. Only later would he add "Coke head" to his billing.

Oom-Pa-Pa Imbroglia! (and the Beatles)

1980. The scandal-ridden Reagan-Boesky-Milken-North era was foreshadowed by the equally-nefarious "counterfeit Oom-Pa-Pa ticket" imbroglia. No doubt the evil super genius behind the 90 forged tickets moved on to bigger and better plots: the Hitler diaries, fake Canadian Tire money, etc. The Journal's ever-Woodward-and-Bernstein-esque news department ran the diagram below to illuminate the complexities of the incident to a no-doubt perplexed and alarmed student body.

Beatlemania also reigned supreme, as dead ringers for John, Paul, George and Ringo (lucky guy!) hit the stage at Jock Harty to give liberal doses of nostalgia. Don Breithaupt found the boys nothing more than a "touring novelty," but unbeknownst to us all it would be only a few months later on Dec. 8, 1980 that John Lennon would check out permanently, eradicating any possible reunion of The Beatles. Oddly enough, Breithaupt found this edition of the tribute to be less deep and meaningful than a previous Beatlemania show he had seen. Indeed, the last time I checked out Road Appies they just weren't as deep and meaningful as the Hip. Who'd a think?

A tale of two Peters

1981. Another pseudo-homecoming concert - Peter Tosh played the week preceding homecoming, but what the hey, he's cool so he's in. Reviewer Mark Evans seemed to be a little dazed and confused by the presence of one of reggae's premier performers. Witness his last paragraph: "The mind reels. There is more. Tosh's song selection simply couldn't miss: 'African,' 'Stepping Razor,' 'Legalize It,' 'Mystic Man,' 'Get Up Stand Up' and of course again 'Legalize It.'" Keep puffin' mark - Jah, jah, jah.

The official homecoming act of this year was comedian Pete Barbutti (who? exactly). Fresh from Las Vegas and appearances on The Merv Griffin Show, Barbutti seemed to be more a hangover from the 70's than the vanguard of comedy. The Journal sent Chris Vemet to the "big event." Vemet noted Barbutti's jokes hit the mark just as easily "among the students as the Geritol set." Sounds about as much fun as an enema (which has that same crossover appeal).

No-name band spawns micro-review

1983. No doubt still reeling from the Oom-Pa-Pa debacle, the powers that be elected to play it close to the vest again this year. The featured artist was the "safe" (read boring) R&B artist Robbie Lane and the Disciples. Replete with rock 'n' roll oldies and Chuck Berry style duck walks, this show was the stuff of legends. Even if you were not among the chosen to see this show, for your reading pleasure we humbly reprint William Wood's 127 word review in its "entirety."

1990. Bootsauce and Kish ruled the Jock Harty roost this year. Entertainment editor emeritus Steve Cain noted with enthusiasm that Bootsauce played much better on uppers (his or the bands'). Not

Real greasers rock Open Air

By WILLIAM WOOD

This year's Homecoming Open Air was as good, if not better, than last year's successes. Certainly the turnout was greater than ever. The music was supplied by an aging, but clearly resurgent band called Robbie Lane and the Disciples. Despite receding hairlines and advancing conservatism they did manage to belt out some fine R&B and early rock 'n' roll. The lead guitarist, in particular, supplied some superb musicianship. The high point of evening included a series of "Chuck" Berry classics replete with Duck Walks.

However, the evening was not too crowded, particularly near the front, and as a result some people were more than gently jostled while dancing. Just the same, this year's Open Air was a good time for all.

to be outdone, Kish needed no such chemical assistance to garner the moxy to probe the crowd's sexual intentions, asking the audience:

"There are a lot of ladies out there tonight, is anybody goin' to get laid?" Whoa - now that's sensitive.

Taking the "swerve" out of the "driver"

New release for band breaks the British mode

Swervedriver
Mezzal Head
Creation/A&M Records
By CHRISTIAN deBRUIJN
The Queen's Journal

A U.K. band which doesn't sound like one, Swervedriver's impressive 1991 debut album Raise, turned the heads of a lot of North American critics. With the influx of the "shoegazer" craze, Swervedriver avoided sounding like the latest British musical trend and surprisingly came off like a mid-Western American band. Comparisons to Husker Du, Dinosaur Jr., and Ride's early wah-wah guitar were made. Unfortunately, lack of support from the British Press (and therefore public support) followed, probably due to the fact that Swervedriver doesn't sound "British."

While Swervedriver admittedly sights Husker Du and Dinosaur Jr. as influences, their sound is different. The heavy yet melodic bass lines combined with the fast and grinding guitars gave the album a feeling of driving a car at top speed, but going absolutely nowhere. This makes for a much different sound than either Husker Du or Dinosaur Jr. has produced. This description of Swervedriver's music perfectly fits the perception of what today's adolescent and twentysomethings do with their time: not much, going no place and trying at the same time to get there in a hurry.

With Mezzal Head, Swervedriver's line-up has changed. Drummer Graham was replaced by Jess, and bassist Adi by Steve. Luckily the song-writer/guitarists Adam and Jimmy have remained. The sound on Mezzal Head, compared to Raise, has changed quite a bit. Co-producer Alan Moulder (of The Jesus and The Mary Chain fame) was brought in to help the band "polish" its sound. Moulder has succeeded, as the album is more melancholy and subdued. The sound of the throttling, glaring guitars which appeared on Raise, has been toned down. It's unfortunate that Boh Moulder, who initially

"Never Learn," which are both departures for the band. Although at some points they sound like a songs that Sean Cassidy would sing, they nevertheless work well. "Never Lose That Feeling" deals with never losing that spark that makes everything special in those twentiesomething years, hence the chorus: So revealing, never lose that feeling. "Never Learn," an extended instrumental piece with its soothing saxophone overdubbed on to an arrangement of blistering guitars, makes for great modern blues. While not as enjoyable as Raise, Mezzal Head is still an excellent follow-up album. Along with My Bloody Valentine, The Wonderstuff, Kitchens of Distinction and Teenage Fan Club, Swervedriver continues to present itself as one of the more enjoyable and interesting U.K. bands in the past five years.

The politics of banqueting

The Story of Boys and Girls
Directed by Pupi Avati
Princess Court Cinema
BY OWIN LAMBECK
The Queen's Journal

Set in the Italian countryside in 1936, The Story of Boys and Girls is about members of two families, most of whom are emotionally unstable, morally corrupt, or at the very least eccentric. Structured around a huge engagement feast, it is a detailed exploration of the conflicts that arise when two families come together.

Angelo, the prospective groom, is from an aristocratic family hailing from Bologna. His family considers his chosen bride, Sylvia, to be beneath him socially. His family has a collective inferiority complex, and is eager for everything to go well. As the young woman's family prepares the feast, we learn of many indiscretions, intrigues and jealousies. Each character is brimming with concealed emotions and motives, and the banquet provides the atmosphere for many pent-up feelings and hidden anger to boil over.

If you go see this movie, written and directed by acclaimed Italian filmmaker Pupi Avati, don't go hungry. Where most mainstream films offer gratuitous sex and violence, this film serves up gratuitous food scenes. In one scene, the father enumerates every dish served at the meal, including pork outlets, stewed duck, freshly-killed rabbit, tortellini in broth, fruit tarts, cakes, wines and liqueurs. This gives us a solid picture of what the meal itself is like, which is important since the feast is the constant element that holds the film together.

This is in many ways a satisfying movie, but the pleasure derived from viewing it is very much unlike a typical viewing experience. The Story of Boys and Girls abandons conventional narrative structure, which has its advantages as well as its difficulties. With no central characters to identify with and lots of confusing twists and turns, plus the fact that it is subtitled, the film can make the viewer feel somewhat alienated. Over thirty characters enter scenes almost randomly, the relationships in the film are difficult to follow, yet this adds to the sense that the situation and people are real, rather than being manipulated for dramatic effect.

In fact, at the one point where a standard dramatic element is introduced to push the action forward, it comes off as predictable and contrived. (When a gun-toting idiot in a film says "It's not loaded!" - is it ever not loaded?) This one slip into a more conventional style of dramatisation, however, only serves to increase one's appreciation of where the true story lies. The families' almost immediate return to restrained, polite, social conversation after every disruptive event shows just how uncomfortable everyone is, and often a mere glance brings out subtleties in certain relationships with a remarkable clarity that pages of dialogue could not accomplish.

Although the people in the film often get upset and hysterical, the film itself maintains a surprisingly calm disposition from start to finish. Avati never lets us get caught up in the emotions of one character, as the scene always shifts back to the context of the rest of the family before we get to explore any one person's situation too closely. This can be frustrating at times, but it does provide a more realistic idea of what being an observer at the banquet would be really like.

All in all, that is the essence of the viewing experience of this film. If you go see The Story of Boys and Girls you will be a guest at a banquet. If you watch closely enough, you will learn all sorts of juicy bits of information about a number of interesting people.

Bach to basics with the Melos Ensemble

Queen's professor leads choir through the baroque

The Melos Ensemble
St. James' Anglican Church
BY STEPHEN CHOI
The Queen's Journal

Last Friday, The Melos Ensemble of singers presented a rather ambitious programme of baroque chamber singing at the St. James' Anglican Church. The evening featured three works by Johann Sebastian Bach and a work by Georg Philipp Telemann, accompaniment was provided by a small group of instrumentalists consisting of an oboe, two violins, a cello, and an organ.

The Melos Ensemble is a local group of musicians under the direction of David Cameron, a professor at Queen's in the School of Music. Twenty members make up this choir with a roughly equal number of musicians singing the four main parts. The group as a whole had some very fine moments, but this was also an evening to showcase some of the individual talent within the choir.

The programme started with Bach's Cantata No. 22, Jesus nahm zu sich die Zwölfe, featuring Jeffrey Halon and Paul Appleby singing the respective tenor and baritone solos. Although the raw voices themselves were more than adequate, the pronunciation of the German text might have had Kingston Hall cringing. Appleby would have done well to round out his vowels and brighten the consonants. Halon's solo part was somewhat shorter but had the most textually-meaningful Aria.

The Aria presented the problem of singing a piece in a foreign language and not knowing what it is that one is saying. The Aria's translation conveys a profound sense of hope and humility, yet the mood created was quite indifferent and without proper feeling. The first Aria, an alto solo, was solidly sung by Juliette Milsome; however, the highlight of this piece was a wonderfully flowing oboe part carrying both principle and secondary melodies throughout the singing. While not performed entirely cleanly, the playing was expressive and was carried by the sheer beauty of the music.

The Telemann Cantata for the New Year seemed to address the problems in the previous piece. This cantata was sung entirely by soprano Rhona Gale, whose voice shone with confidence and a refreshingly crisp pronunciation of the text. This number was performed without the help of Maestro Cameron, and although this reinforced the feeling of security in Gale, the failed entrance into the final Aria by the accompanying musicians was worth a wince.

The Bach Cantata No. 82, Ich habe genügt, sung by baritone Douglas Routeledge, was, on the other hand, conducted throughout. The difficulty of this piece lies in that it is dominated by a theme of despair and longing for death. Routeledge's performance, while satisfying, did not shine with the confidence of the previous, and the now conspicuous presence of the conductor emphasized this fact. His presence, however, did not prevent another abysmal opening in which the music had to be stopped and restarted, much to the visible relief of the soloist, yet also to the dismay of the audience.

The evening ended with Bach's Motet No. 1, Singet dem Herrn ein Lied, sung by the entire ensemble.

This piece was unequivocally the highlight of the evening. Although at times it was difficult to pick out the male voices, the female voices shone throughout long scales creating a delightful mood that was both bright and energetic. The smiles on the faces of the ensemble (who had been patiently waiting) enhanced the joyful atmosphere, and they sang as if unleashed. By the Foot Allegro, the ensemble's sound was both strong and rousing, leading to a merry romp through the final Fugue vivace. It is this type of memorable sound that warrants looking forward to hearing this ensemble, as a whole, perform again.

Windsor retro-rockers strut their stuff at Stages

The Tea Party with The Smartest Monkeys
Stages
BY PHILIP A. MCBRIDE
The Queen's Journal

In a flurry of light and sound the dark stage roared to life, as the expectant crowd cheered for what they saw and heard: music reminiscent of rock masters Led Zeppelin, and vocals echoing the deep baritone of The Doors leader Jim Morrison. In some ways it was a musical deja vu, but a few minutes of the show revealed something totally new. This was The Tea Party, who, for the next hour-and-a-half, served a veritable buffet of musical versatility to the hungry ears of the Stages audience.

Before any main course comes the appetizer, which was served up in style by the opening band The Smartest Monkeys, who managed to capture the attention of the sparse crowd with their appropriately self-defined "unexpected rock." The band (comprised of Jay Harris, Jon McCann, Matt Dickson, Mike Peason, and Scott Stevenson) belted out their original numbers in an intriguing combination of varying musical styles. Together for a mere year-and-a-half, The Smartest Monkeys are no strangers to the club scenes of Toronto, Ottawa, and Kingston, where they frequently can be found jamming at The Toucan. Stages, however, seemed the wrong place for the band's particular sound, and hopefully they will soon be seen headlining in smaller campus bars.

At 11:30, the true party began as The Tea Party took to the stage in a whirlwind of lights and guitars. Vocalist/guitarist Jeff Martin led the band into "The River," the extremely successful first release from the gold album Splendor Solis. Drummer Jeff Burrows and bassist Stuart Chatwood complete the trio from Windsor, who have been playing together for the last three years. "The River" brought the audience to their feet immediately, and was soon followed by "Midsummer Day" and "Raven Skies," both of which highlighted Burrow's searing drum-work and the classic rock guitar combinations of Chatwood and Martin.

A complete turnaround came with the slow sounds of the song "In This Time," which saw the trio seated front stage; Burrows with a bongo drum, and the guitarists on stools. Martin set the song's atmosphere with an old harp-guitar, making this ballad a much-needed departure from the breakneck intensity of the first few songs. This sudden change, however, seemed to lose the audience's attention for a time, but it was quickly regained with the flamenco sounds of the instrumental "Winter Solstice."

Another brilliant departure saw Martin slipping on the glass slide for the deep, soulful blues of "Sun Going Down." The song was a lengthy blues triumph, but once again the crowd seemed lost, perhaps by the creative versatility of the band, or perhaps (as one fan noted) by the fact that Stages was the wrong venue for The Tea Party's style.

Either way, they were soon brought back into the fold with the evening's final number, "Save Me," the recently re-mastered and re-released single from an earlier independent album. The song was confidently referred to as the band's musical breakthrough and the video for it was unveiled on Wednesday. The band returned to a roar of cheers for their encore, the experimental rhythm and blues number "Walk With Me."

Since The Tea Party's stunning rapid success in the Canadian music scene, they have been unable to escape comparisons with various classic rock bands, such as The Doors and Led Zeppelin. This is no wonder, considering that vocalist/guitarist Jeff Martin - with his deep baritone voice and curly black mane - bears a striking resemblance to the Lizard King himself.

In an interview with the band, I brought up these similarities to past rock icons. Bassist Stuart Chatwood claimed the only similarity stems from Martin's baritone vocal style, and that the band has had many influences at differing times of their careers, starting with The Beatles and moving through The Smiths to a rediscovery of 60's and 70's rock. Chatwood admitted that nine times out of ten the comparisons to The Doors are taken as flattery. He also attributed the comparisons to the fact that, like The Doors, The Tea Party strive to create "timeless music and universal themes."

Whether or not they accomplish this remains to be seen, yet for now The Tea Party's popularity is skyrocketing. The band credits much of their exposure to both the Toronto radio station CFNY and to MuchMusic. Chatwood also attributed their success to the fact that they take their music seriously, unlike other bands "who are like high-school athletes, and treat music like a sport."

Call The Tea Party what you will, and compare them to whoever you wish; their music will hopefully continue to evolve to a stage where such comparisons will be needless. With the versatility shown at Tuesday's concert, the band has definitely proven their potential. Just as Martin stated before the final song of the evening: "it never ends." Not one head in the building shook in disagreement.

Let the party continue.

Queen's prof mines the absurdity of Mother Russia

Wright discusses his new comic adaptation

BY DAVID LEACH
The Queen's Journal

An imaginary paper soldier is created by a bored clerk, then somehow becomes a favourite of the Emperor. Afraid that the Emperor will discover he is only a hoax, the other soldiers invent various adventures for him, so that he is promoted, sent to Siberia, gets married, and even tames a child without having ever existed. At the same time, a real soldier is lost to a clerical error and is cast off into a mad bureaucratic limbo.

A day in the life of Franz Kafka? Part of Bob Rae's new social contract? No, this is just the plot to Theatre 5's latest comedy, Lieutenant Kizhe (pronounced: Kee-shay), adapted by Queen's professor A. Colin Wright from a novella of the same title.

"I've been writing plays for eight or nine years," said Wright, who has been at Queen's for 29 years and is now in charge of the Russian Department, "but I haven't had a great deal of theatrical experience besides a little acting in my school years."

Lieutenant Kizhe is the first of his plays to be produced. However, Wright already scored big with his script when it won a prestigious national award sponsored by Theatre B.C. The award included a week at Granville Island in Vancouver to workshop, revise and listen to readings of the script by professional actors, all of which helped to hone it to its present shape.

The novella, published in 1928 by Soviet author and critic Yuri Tynyanov, is set in the Tsarist Russia of Emperor Paul I, who is a major character in the book and the play. "It's very much in the absurd mode," said Wright. "You have one guy, who is in fact alive, but whom everybody considers dead, and the other, who is dead, but whom everybody considers alive. Of course, the Emperor was generally considered mad, and he was in fact murdered, so his behaviour is a little odd at times.

"It's the kind of idea that once you have a bureaucracy, then a character who is created because of an error can almost assume a life of its own. . . . The other characters come to adapt to the circumstances so that they half believe in his existence. There are scenes in which the character is being whipped before he is sent to Siberia and, of course, there is no one there!

"It's like the situation you used to get in Soviet Russia where if you ever tried to argue with people, they would always quote the theory rather than what their eyes would see. That if the higher-ups say so then it must be this way, even if it doesn't seem to make sense. Which was a very Russian attitude during the Soviet time," Wright explained. For a 1934 film version of the novella, Prokofiev composed "The Lieutenant Kizhe Suite," which is being used in the Theatre 5 production. "That suite became very well known," Wright said. "It's now part of the standard repertoire. It's better known than the actual novella and the film that inspired it. It's delightful music and it fits very well with the absurd quality of the play."

The play is directed by Valerie Robertson, and after seeing several dress rehearsals, Wright is quite impressed. "There's over twenty-seven costumes, which is quite a lot. The stage setting is fairly opulent. They've taken a lot of care to get the period right," he noted with pleasure. "Valerie Robertson has a wonderful sense of the stage."

"It was actually Valerie Robertson's suggestion," Wright said, "the idea to do the play." She phoned me a year ago and asked me if I could get the book for her, knowing that I wrote plays. I was sure I got hold of it and read it. Then I said, Do you want me to do the adaptation for it?"

The rest, as they say, is history. Lieutenant Kizhe runs from November 4 to 13 at Theatre 5, King Street West. Half-price preview tickets for Nov. 2 and 3 are purchased in Room 404, Kingston Hall, Phone Theatre 5 at 546-5800 for further ticket information.

Ani Difrancu: Folk with an attitude

The Queen's Journal Staff

Ani Difrancu will be performing at Kingston's own K.C.V.I. Auditorium (235 Frontenac St.) on Tuesday, October 26 at 7:30 PM. In case you haven't heard of her, here's some valuable background info:

The music of Ani Difrancu is somewhere along the lines of acoustic feminist folk: she's been labelled everything from "a protest singer of the 90s" to a "one-woman acoustic punk band." Difrancu's critically acclaimed music addresses, among other things, the politics of gender, sexuality and freedom.

Only 22 years old, Ani has been performing in public for more than half her life. In 1992, she made some riveting debut appearances at various North American summer music festivals and repeatedly set on-site album sales records. Her third release, Imperfectly, reached No. 15 on the Canadian national alternative radio charts.

Tickets are $10 (the event is also a fundraiser for PIC Press) and are available throughout Kingston at: The Grand Theatre, Brian's Record Option, Tara Foods, CD Land, Frequency, the A.M.S. office — or phone 542-4253 for more information.

Cervisophile by Ash Baker Campus Cervisophila

This week, in the spirit of Queen's patriotism and the need to find a good beer on campus during Homecoming, Cervisophile examines the Campus Pubs, not from the point of view of where-to-go-to-have-a-good-time-or-what's-the-music-like, but from the point of view of good beer: whether they have it, whether the atmosphere is conducive to drinking it, etc., etc. There are four campus pubs: Alfie's, Clark Hall Pub, The Grad Club, and The Quiet Pub. We shall deal with them each in turn.

Alfie's

From the cervisophile's perspective, Alfie's is sadly lacking. On draught they have only Budweiser and Canadian, and in bottles the usual domestic suspects. I find Bud a weak, characterless beer, and Canadian, while a bit better, is too sweet for my taste. The atmosphere isn't really conducive to good beer-drinking either. The music is on the loud side, the dancing is on the bad side, and the clientele seems more often than not on the drunk side. All of this is fine in and of itself, but it can be a distraction when trying to savour a fine beer (which Alfie's doesn't have anyway). If you must go, have a Labatt Genuine Draught out of a glass, but if you want a good beer, I'd look elsewhere.

Clark Hall Pub

Clark is a little better than Alfie's. On draught they have Toby, Export, and Moosehead. Toby is a perfectly good lager, and is definitely the draught to drink at Clark — unless, like Michael J. Fox, you have a passionate craving for Moosehead (They also carry Rickard's Red, Connor's, Dragon's Breath and Stragbrow Cider — et al.). Unfortunately, the place does not really cater to cervisophiles. The music, though very good, is very loud, and the atmosphere is raucous on a good night. Also, the fixtures, tables, floors, and walls get a bit sticky from time to time — always a distraction. Clark can be a great party, but it is not the place for fine beer.

Before I continue, let's make one thing clear: I am not gratuitously cutting up Clark and Alfie's. They are great places to go when you want a good party or a bit of a piss-up. However, the simple fact is that they are not very good pubs to enjoy fine ales in.

The Grad Club

Ah, this is more like it! The Grad Club is a more congenial place for the cervisophile. The building used to be a house, and so is divided up into cosy rooms of a reasonable size. The atmosphere is relaxed, casual, and entirely appropriate for the savouring of a good ale. Conversation is possible, you can hear yourself think sometimes. On draught are Upper Canada Lager, Upper Canada Imperial Stout, Connor's Best Bitter, and Dragon's Breath Pale Ale. These beers are very good and eminently drinkable, although the stout can take a little getting used to. Particularly notable is Dragon's Breath, being a filtered and carbonated version of the real ale made at the Kingston Brew Pub, downtown. It is not quite as lovely as the real thing, but it is still an excellent ale with a wonderful hoppy (bitter) tang. Connor's is great too. In addition to the beers on draught they have Smithwick's, St. Ambrose, Newcastle Brown Ale, and Guinness in bottles, as well as a selection of domestics, including Labatt Maxim Ice (7% Oaht). The Grad Club is a great place to enjoy a really good beer: the ambience is nice and the beer is excellent. (The Grad Club is at the corner of Union and Barrie.)

The Quiet Pub

The other good place to have a great beer on campus is the Quiet Pub. The draught selections are a bit limited: Moosehead, Carlsberg, Flower's, and Rickard's Red. Of these, Flower's is a dark brown ale, not as black as Guinness, but almost as opaque. The flavour is an odd, organic one, especially for those weaned on lager — I recommend that you try a half the first time. Rickard's Red is a fine ale, not too bitter, and a good introduction into the realm of English beer. The QP's selection of bottled beer more than makes up for any draught inadequacies: when I was there the list was: Pub Draught Guinness, Smithwick's, Corona, Dos Equis, Newcastle Brown, Heineken, Double Diamond, Red Stripe, Steinlager, Bass, and Strongbow Cider, plus assorted domestics. The atmosphere at the QP is wonderful, too: good service, oak panelling, comfortable couches and chairs, sensible lighting, and a noise level that permits conversation — what more could the cervisophile ask for?

In sum, while Clark and Alfie's are good at what they do, what they do not do is cater to the cervisophile. For a fine beer on campus, the QP and the Grad Club are the places to be.

From the editors:

"Just what is a cervisophile, anyway?" is the most commonly asked question around these parts, after "Where's the bathroom?" The word is derived from two latin root words: cerviso, meaning "beer" (Never asked for a cerveza, my gringo muchacho?) and philia, meaning "love." One supposes people who don't like beer are cervisophobes.

Our electronic grammar checker (Gram-motek 5) rates this article at the grade 8 level with a reading ease index of 70 (you'd need 6 to 10 years of education to read this). The average word length was 4.43 letters or 1.62 syllables per word. In other words, most people should be able to understand this article.

Ash Baker has yet to see if the Sanctuary Vampire Sex Bar in Toronto is a good place for cervisophiles.

Our readers ask: What's with the grammar checking?

We at Back Page/MISC are hard-core technophiles. Any new piece of ware, either hard or soft, beckons us to slot it and see how it works. Imagine our glee when we discovered the grammar-checking software lying dormant on our hard disk. Couple that with a recent letter complaining about the sorry state of writing in this fine publication and a mandate to push the performance envelope of The Journal, and we have a perfect excuse to try out our toy.

The grade level rating and the reading ease index are two different calculations which determine how difficult something is to read. As a comparison, USA Today is purposely written at the grade 3 level, People at about grade 5. The reading ease index is a scale ranging from 1 to 100, where 100 is the easiest and 1 means "For Nobel Prize winners only."

SPECIAL HOMECOMING EDITION

Skeletons in Our Closet by Joey deVila

Until 1988, "Alumni Weekend" was officially called "Homecoming". The name change was made by the administration and resulted from several incidents of

Streetparties • Shenanigans

The 1984 streetparty is a classic example of old-style Queen's Homecoming mayhem. Almost a thousand streetpartiers gathered on University Avenue between Clergy and Bar streets on both Friday and Saturday nights of Homecoming '84. The Journal, as it often did those days, printed contradictory reports in different issues: one story claimed no damage ensued, while the next ran a photo of a very surprised young preppy about to help tip a car on its side. Theft was also reported; a student house on William Street was relieved of $800 worth of kegs, two of which were still full. "It was really an asshole thing to do," said one of the grammatically-challenged members of the household.

Then Vice-Principal Duncan Sinclair attempted to get the crowd to go home. Standing behind the open door of a police car and yelling over a megaphone (the preferred tactic of the "heavy" in countless teen comedies), Sinclair was pelted with beer caps, jeered and offered beer by the crowd. Sinclair's next tactic was to mingle with the crowd, in the hopes of getting down some names for later prosecution (didn't he watch Fraternity Vacation?). This tactic failed miserably, what with people claiming to be Michael Jackson and others saying "We're from Western. We can do anything we want." Many of the partiers, it turned out, did come from Western.

Reactions varied, depending on whom you were. Alderman Ken Thompson said troops with water hoses should have been called in while Sheila Craig (Comm '87) denounced the negative press, claiming that the media were being sensationalistic and that Queen's just has plenty of spirit. Tom Cavanaugh (Arts '87) simply said "This is more fun than watching chicken parts thaw. Scoobie!" Anyone who understood that remark should write us immediately.

The only Kingston resident whom we're certain appreciated the drunken revelry was one Mitchell McArthur. McArthur, a tenant at Millhaven Institution became a "walkaway" from the Corrections Institute term shortly before 2 a.m. Saturday morning, as two streetparties took place on University Avenue, diluting the police force's ability to capture him.

The relative calm of the 1985 streetparty was so well-received by both town and gown. Kahunas that in 1986, a legal streetparty was organized. Student leaders spent several months planning an event that would involve a 600-ft road trip of Carleton students and a $25,000 budget for the street festivities, which were to take place on Union Street. Then-AMS President Jim Hughes said that this would be "perhaps the most exciting Homecoming Weekend ever."

And yet exciting it was. The Becker's store at Earl and Barrie was raided by students who threw around food and beer, stole as much as they could and urinated on the floor. A popular anecdote recounts the tale of one especially vile looter, who defecated in the ice cream fridge. The Saturday party was even more exciting, with the almost 15,000 attendees of the Open Air Concert streaming onto University Avenue. Students accused the police of using excessive force, including smashing a bottle over one student's head and engaging another (who claimed to have been just walking down the street with a backpack containing a few beers) in a choke hold. Another student claimed that when he asked why he was being arrested, the police officer responded "because you're a fucking asshole cocksucker." One assumes that's police jargon for "drunk and disorderly."

City Council spared no time in directing their wrath at Queen's students. Many councilors suggested that Homecoming be banned, their argument being Queen's students could not control themselves.

The last streetparty took place in 1987. The Saturday night street party, which was attended by 3,000 students, occurred on University Avenue (where else?) and resulted in arrests, damage to a police cruiser by a student trying to break out, and damage to the sign on Freddie's grocery after a student performed a Homecoming dance routine on top of it. Then-mayor John Gerretsen, himself an alumnus, blamed the length of Frosh Week (the ten days) for the students' behaviour. "In the process of building up Queen's as a special place," said Gerretsen, "the students' perception of the city in which they live is a negative one." A story often told by Queen's alumnus Ali Velshi describes a tense moment where Vice-Principal "Party" Tom Williams was involved in an argument with the police, pleading with them not to try out their new tear gas cartridges.

This was the proverbial "last straw". Homecoming's name was changed to "Alumni Weekend" in order to distance the event from the associated rowdiness (perhaps Gerretsen can change its name to "Cyndi"?). The AMS organized student patrols in order to disperse streetpartiers, while the Kingston Police recruited officers from other departments in the area. The 1988 Homecoming was calm and orderly, what with three officers at every street corner. Streetparties these days are limited to those organized by the "Hub" bars (Stages at AJ's Hangar) and are legal events held on Princess Street. The last spontaneous one took place when the Jays won the last World Series. This was a nation-wide party and little or no damage resulted. I suppose we can hope that the Jays threw the game on Thursday (as this is being written) and win on Saturday. A Saturday victory would result in nation-wide revelry, and as long as we don't destroy anything, we at MISC seriously doubt that even the mighty KPS stormtroopers can arrest the entire country. Just stay the hell off my lawn!

Written at the grade 12 level (uhh?) • Reading ease index: 49 (>10 years' schooling, difficult for most readers)

Joey deVila was arrested many times as a street vendor, but never as a streetpartier.

WHERE ARE THEY NOW? STILL TOGETHER AFTER ALL THESE YEARS...

In this age of mobile labour, it can be very hard for a couple to stay together and try to begin their careers at the same time. That is why, for this Alumni Weekend issue of The Journal, we would like to feature one such couple who have withstood the pressures forced upon young people trying to carve out their existence in an economically hostile world.

Erika Schengili-Roberts (Arts 1990)

I thought I had better tell you a little of what I do since not everyone knows what a boom operator is. Essentially, I am a sound technician in the film industry specializing in location sound.

Although I do some sound recording, I am mainly boom operator (the person who holds the long pole with the mike on the end). My main purpose is to represent the sound department on the set. Since I know the mixer's style of recording, I can better decide where to place the mike, deal with any shadow problems caused by the boom and communicate any technical problems the mixer has with a particular take to the appropriate people on the set.

It is hard to pin down exactly what influenced my time at Queen's had on me. I went to University to get an education and not for a specific job. Although I knew I wanted to be involved in the media, I had no idea I would end up doing what I am doing now; not even after graduating.

One of the main things that has helped me to deal with the difficulties of my job was feminism theory and the voluminous reading and writing I did in this and other subjects. This helped in two aspects: it allowed me to formulate a way of thinking about why people think and act the way they do, and helped change my way of working with people to better deal with (and maybe even change) social attitudes.

This may sound strange coming from the one who swings a boom around all day, but I do have at least thirty people on it and the majority are male; which means that I not only have to get along with them, but also deal with their attitudes and idealism. To be fair to the guys, the majority of men on sets are very bright and if they have not gone to university are well read and aware of current issues. They are respectful of me and the work I do, and have no trouble at all with my being a woman, but sexism does happen in very subtle ways sometimes.

My job requires me to be a very good politician as sound is not generally viewed as the most important aspect of film making, and yet we depend on may other departments to get what we need. There is a lot of bending, manipulating and fighting to get the sound we need/want. I suppose what I am saying is that my education made me a stronger more confident person.

There are very few people in this world who can say they love what they are doing, so I consider myself a very lucky person. I love being on set; right in there riding the top of the frame, dancing around dolly track, and lights (which cause those dreaded boom shadows). The only problem for a desk job for anything.

I look at my time at Queen's like I'm sure most people do: with a certain amount of nostalgia. However, after my four years it was time to go, and I have no desire to go back. I have a lot of very good memories, and have no regrets for having gone to Queen's not for studying Film Theory. The thing I miss the most is the access to a variety of interesting activities.

I was a programmer at CFRC the campus radio station. I was involved in the theatre department, I played trumpet with the music department's Wind Ensemble, and made films. Because of my unpredictable work schedule, I really can't get involved in any of these other interests now.

On the technical side, my education at Queen's was not paramount. Most of what I know of my job was learned through apprenticeship and just doing it. I suppose the program gave me a good basic understanding of how a film is put together and how the various elements work, but it was not a Ryerson kind of in-depth examination of the hardware.

Nevertheless, I really think that it is not necessary to become a technician on a film set. You learn more on a working set than any book or teacher could possibly explain in three years. This is not to put Ryerson down, as they do provide an excellent program, but if you know what you want to do, the best thing to do is go out and do it.

Keith and I got married after he graduated from his Masters program. I was already swinging a boom so he knew the kind of crazy hours I worked and the intense stress I am under at work, so he knew what to expect. Nevertheless, it is still difficult because we may not see each other for a month except in the middle of the night when I flop into bed. He has been extremely supportive and understanding and I don't think I would still be doing this without his foundation of support and encouragement.

Keith Schengili-Roberts (Arts 89, MPA 91)

They say that whatever field your degree is in, you are fated to not get a job in that area. After finishing a Bachelors in English, I came back a year later to do a Masters in Public Administration. I now work primarily as the Toronto correspondent for The Computer Paper, a national monthly computer newspaper. My experiences and education at Queen's has provided me with many valuable skills in a time of a turbulent job market.

My education has proved useful, but not in the way I originally imagined. My background in English has given me the ability to express myself clearly in print — a talent in surprisingly short supply.

I graduated from my Masters program at a time when all levels of government started to drastically cut back on hiring. I eventually landed a job at the Department of Communications, working for a while in the Public Relations section.

While there, I decided to do something with my Master's thesis on technology, and eventually whittled it down to an article that got into Toronto Computes!, a local computer-oriented newspaper. Soon I was asked to do more for this paper, and in the end I was hired away from them to work as a freelance writer for the nationally-distributed Computer Paper, writing software reviews and covering the local computing "beat" for them.

I would never have guessed I would end up where I am now even a couple of years ago, and yet it was at Queen's that I was able to express myself clearly and concisely in print. Ceaselessly churning out essay after essay can only improve your writing style, and though it's not a lot of fun at the time, there is a definite payoff to be had when you can communicate your point effectively. The Computer Paper hired me to write for them about computers not because of my background in computers so much as my ability to grasp the essentials of story or a new product, and then pass that knowledge on to a wide audience.

My extra-curricular activities at Queen's campus radio station also did a lot for me — it gave me the confidence to do things I never thought I would be "good enough" to do, and taught me that if you don't push yourself to do things no-one else will.

I was always part of the "alternative" crowd at Queen's, and could never identify with any of the loopy antics other students got into that most people identify with the dreaded "Queen's Spirit". Instead I gravitated towards a collection of people who were a little off-kilter, whose home at that time was the campus radio station, CFRC.

There I had the chance to mix with people who wanted to "push back the envelope" in radio. CFRC was also where I met my wife Erika, so the place will always hold fond memories.

Probably the hardest thing after graduating is settling into the job market. The first year after graduation was not easy, but the long hours Erika and I both had to put into our respective professions are beginning to pay off.

This understandably has often put a strain on our marriage, but Erika and I have a long friendship and common experiences to draw upon, many of them from time spent at Queen's.

What I remember most about Queen's are not its traditions or events, but meeting good friends, taking satisfaction in the work I did there, and the many late-night talks with people discussing the things that mattered. These are the things you take with you wherever you go.

Liberal Party to form majority government

Milliken returned to the House of Commons

THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL STAFF
The Queen's Journal

Kingston and the Islands voted in accordance with Ontario last night, decisively choosing the Liberals, who swept almost every seat in the province.

Meanwhile, much of the country ignored the traditional three parties. British Columbia and Alberta voted strongly for the Reform Party, while Quebec backed the Bloc Quebecois.

At press time last night, Liberals had won or were leading in 177 ridings, while both the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party had 53. These figures included only early returns from British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta. It was not yet obvious who would form the official opposition.

The New Democratic Party and the Progressive Conservatives lost a considerable numbers of seats. At press time the NDP led in nine ridings, and the Conservatives in only two. This was the first time in Canadian history that the NDP finished ahead of the Tories.

The Liberals were strongest in Ontario and the Maritime provinces, but secured seats in the West and Quebec as well.

Local Liberal candidate Peter Milliken, the incumbent, was returned to office by a large margin—capturing approximately 57 per cent of the vote. This unofficial figure was the latest available at press time.

Milliken was elated with his victory. Speaking to The Journal, he said, "I'm delighted. It's a pretty decisive victory. Certainly everything that people said on their doorstep, they obviously meant it."

He credited the Liberals' success to Jean Chretien's performance throughout the election. "He's done wonderfully. I think he's convinced Canadians that he wasn't the old person that the Tories and the national media portrayed him as. He's not 'yesterday's man,' he's today's man. He did a very good job," he said.

Milliken said the shifting of Conservative votes to the Reform Party was a factor. "There's no

ASUS VP receives Surface-related threats

BY SARAH MACWHIRTER
The Queen's Journal

As of the end of last week, Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Vice-President Heath Grant does not look forward to hearing his messages when he gets home.

Late last week, Grant received two calls, both of which he considers to be threatening.

"I took it as a death threat," Grant said in an interview with The Journal Sunday evening.

The first call, which was recorded on Grant's answering machine sometime Thursday while he was out, consisted of "psycho-punk music" fading in and out with his name repeated in the background. The caller was male and distorted his voice.

The second call was recorded by Grant's answering machine on Friday.

"The message was, 'Bring Surface back!'"

Again, the male voice was distorted, resulting in a deep and elongated sound. Machine guns barked and psychotic laughter followed in male and female voices, both somewhat distorted.

"After this I just turned off my machine for the rest of the weekend," Grant said.

When asked if he thought the calls came from Surface supporters, Grant said, "that would be my assumption, yes."

"It's upsetting because of the position we're in. We openly supported the paper," Grant said.

"We're in an awful position because no matter how much we do we're going to be criticized," Grant said. He added that "it's upsetting that people would act in this extreme."

The ASUS Special General Meeting to decide the fate of Surface will be held on Nov. 4, and Grant is concerned as to what could happen in the meantime.

"We're reaching a climax," he said. "The action hasn't been taken and that's why it's concerning to get a threat like this so early."

Grant described the threatening calls as an "intimidation factor."

However, he said that the calls do not change why he supported the paper.

"It also doesn't change the fact that we have to be accountable," he added.

ASUS President Jenn Steeves is taking the threats seriously.

She has asked Queen's Security to boost security at the Core (the ASUS house at 183 University Ave.) and has notified Queen's Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations) Tom Williams.

Steeves said she is concerned that people involved with ASUS may be endangered.

"It's more upsetting that someone has put this much effort into it—it lends a lot more realism to it," said Steeves, referring to the voice distortion and machine gun fire.

"It is an additional reason to make sure that [the safety of] people involved in ASUS is ensured," she said.

Steeves noted that there have

Naked dancers, drunk alumni and students, and elated baseball fans emptied out onto University Avenue Saturday, as Queen's witnessed the first homecoming street party in six years.

While some characterized the night as surprisingly harmless, at least a few people suffered property damage, as students danced on cars, denting them.

A quiet homecoming Saturday turned into a huge public celebration after Joe Carter's dramatic ninth-inning home run nestled into the left field bleachers, giving the Blue Jays back to back World Series Championships.

Kingston City Police estimated that between four and five thousand students and alumni thronged onto University Avenue to celebrate.

Many had praise for both the behaviour of celebrants and the way the police handled the party.

Nancy Tatham of Town Gown Relations, who sits on the Alumni Weekend Review Board, said that "the police did an excellent job. They controlled the crowd and kept the people safe."

Bryan McKenzie chair of the Alma Mater Society's Alumni Weekend Committee, said he believes the police handled the situation perfectly.

"They realized what was happening and they let it happen while making sure that nothing got out of control," he said.

Tatham expressed concern that some students would use the Blue Jays' victory as an excuse to damage private property.

But, she said, "there was no wanton vandalism and hooliganism. Everyone was in high spirits."

"I was up and down the street throughout the celebration and there was some damage to cars from the sheer weight on top of them. People on the porches and front lawns did frighten some private citizens, and they called the police. But mostly, people were just excited about the game," said Tatham.

McKenzie agreed. "Ninety-nine per cent of those there were really good natured and happy... It was a big mob but it wasn't an angry or nasty mob."

Celebrating 20 years of pride

BY SARAH COOPER
The Queen's Journal

Alumni Weekend saw reunions for all of Queen's returning graduates, but the Lesbian and Gay Association celebrated a particularly special homecoming with alumni this year.

1993 marks the association's 20th anniversary, and on Saturday afternoon approximately 50 people gathered at the Grad Club to celebrate the event.

Many alumni spoke with The Journal on the condition their last names be withheld. Boyd, an Arts '93 alumni, said Queen's is still one of the worst universities to be gay at. It's a much less relaxed atmosphere than places like Concordia or Trent.

However, Boyd was quick to assert that he was pleased with the LGA's success in providing information, support and social events.

LGA Board Member Patrick Jignac also pointed out that, "A lot has come out of the LGA in the past few years...including the radio program [Chris Veldhoven's After Stonewall], the Lesbian, Gay and Bi-sexual Issues Committee and Club Vogue."

Both Boyd and Jignac said they had seen Queen's faces and jackets "out" in gay bars in Toronto, but that many of those same people "went back in the closet" once they came to Queen's.

But once again, both said they believed encouraging signs of social awareness were growing in the Queen's community.

"From people that I talked to, I don't think the political awareness of oppression was as developed in the 70's, but I still think there was an amount of openness and a sense of freedom that doesn't exist anymore due to economic pressures and health issues."

Jignac said.

The LGA (formally the Queen's Homophile Association) was started by student Jean-Phillippe Wilmshurst, with the help of math professor Jim Whitley, in 1973.

In an interview published in Kingston lesbian, gay and bisexual publication Inside Out, Wilmshurst said "at that time, Queen's was the only Ontario university that did not have some kind of a gay support group."

Kingston in 1973 "was pretty closeted," Wilmshurst said. "[It] was a small community, Queen's had a bad time [and] probably still does have a reputation for being a pretty jock place and it's not surprising that Queen's was the last university in Ontario to get a support group."

Long-time LGA member Nancy Tatham said she believes society in general now is much more open to gay and lesbian issues.

"I'm 32 years-old now and coming out at 15, 16 or 17 was unheard of back then. But it's happening now. The face of it [homosexuality] is really changing," Tatham said.

Tatham said this change was due to the fact that young people today are being exposed to more and better information on homosexual issues, and therefore can become better in tune with who they are.

Anastasia (Arts '88) also said she believes the LGA and lesbian and gay rights in general have progressed considerably in the last 10 years.

"Five years ago lesbian and gay rights weren't even an issue. Ten years ago if the LGA got too visible on campus they risked losing funding. That's why a lot of the organizations in the Grey House banded together - for support and protection," she said.

Dan (Arts '87) said he was happy with the events turnout, and remarked, "I'm sure we're all looking forward with pride to the next 20 years of the LGA."

Dr. Maurice Yeates, director of the new Queen's University International Study Centre at Herstmonceux Castle in England, will be the special guest at a luncheon hosted by the Kingston Branch of the Queen's University Alumni Association.

Yeates will discuss the academic plan for the study centre, the aim of which is to enhance Queen's role in international education and research.

The event will take place on Friday, Nov. 5 at the Catarauqui Golf and Country Club, beginning at 11:30 a.m. Tickets are $14. For information, contact Alumni Affairs.

This is National Occupational Therapy Week. Occupational therapy is a branch of rehabilitation therapy which helps people who have had a disruption in their life affecting self-care, leisure and productivity.

Occupational therapists work in a variety of settings. The therapist works with clients who have problems that occur as a result of aging, a disability, traumatic injury, a disease process or an emotional situation and helps that person maintain a healthy lifestyle with a balance of self care, leisure and productivity.

MCRC wants input

BY JANE MUNDELL
The Queen's Journal

The Main Campus Residents' Council is upset that no students will be allowed to sit on the committee formed to review and renegotiate the food services contract now held by Marriott Foods.

The committee, which will be comprised of Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations) Tom Williams, his executive assistant, Tom Morrow, John Deutsch University Centre Director Jack Sinnott, and Residence and Food Operations Manager Bruce Griffiths, is now meeting to discuss the contract which covers food services for the entire university.

Blair Bertrand, MCRC vice-president, feels that student representation is necessary on this committee. "All of my constituents must buy into the contract. They eat there three times a day," he said.

Bertrand and Alma Mater Society Services Director Jess Dutton, who sits on the JDUC Food Committee, wrote a letter to Williams on Sept. 2 requesting student representation.

The reply, dated Oct. 7, stated that "the determination of companies which receive contracts with the University is a management responsibility. Accordingly, the composition of the decision making committee... will be composed of management personnel."

In an interview with The Journal, Williams said that although no students will sit on the committee, "students' staff and faculty will be consulted several times during the process.

"In the first meeting, we will be getting advice on the elements they want considered and what criteria should be used in assessing the bids," he said.

The committee will then ask prospective bidders to submit a proposal before making open presentations to all interested groups. These groups would later be asked for written comments and feedback.

"We will be seeking as broad an input as possible from the MCRC and the AMS," Williams said. "We will go out of our way to try and get it," he said.

Bertrand, however, claimed that MCRC found out by mistake about the decision-making committee. He expressed his belief that it was "a conscious decision not to include students."

Bertrand compared the situation to that of the Charlottetown Constitutional Accord, saying that "if they don't involve people in the process, they will speak out." He encouraged those who are "upset enough about it to call the office of VP Williams."

Dutton suggested that both students and faculty should be more active in the process.

"Students have been complaining about food for years. It would be great for the university to give the students the power to decide as well. We all have to eat," he said.

Marriott's contract expires at the end of June 1994.

What's a plinth?

Cornerstone ceremony at Stauffer site

Queen's Chancellor Agnes Benidickson knows what a plinth is.

BY ADRIENNE MUNRO
The Queen's Journal

There was a spirit of excitement in the air on homecoming Saturday, as over one hundred alumni and Queen's enthusiasts gathered at 11 a.m. to witness the ceremonial laying of the cornerstone at the Stauffer Library.

Queen's official marching band started the ceremonies off, leading the invited guests, faculty and some 10 dignitaries, to their designated places at the centre of the crowd. On this beautiful sunny morning, people of all ages grouped around the veiled slab at the corner of University and Union.

The Stauffer Library was the focus of the gathering on Saturday, and, according to Dr. Bill McLatchie, dean of graduate studies, it will likely become the focus of Queen's campus for the twenty-first century. It stands as the centrepiece of the sesquicentennial year.

In his address, Principal David Smith emphasized that all great libraries are built upon three things. First, he said, there is the concept, where functional plans and architectural expression merge.

The second feature is the "necessity of adequate resources," including individual support.

Thirdly, he said, "Stauffer was founded on the strong personal commitment from many people who will help to make it one of the greatest libraries ever known."

Smith told the crowd that the library will give the university a "new sense of academic stature" and "access to a whole stock of knowledge in the world."

However, he said that the status of the new library as a "vital new link to the future does not mean abandoning old traditions."

Following Smith's address, two time capsules were ceremoniously placed in what is called the "plinth," a large slab of concrete located at the corner of University and Union.

The capsules contain memorabilia of the past sesquicentennial year, and will be kept under lock and key until the Queen's 250th anniversary in the year 2093.

One of the lighter moments of the ceremony was the "pouring of substances" onto the plinth. A ceremonial concoction of rose petals, pine needles, clover, thistles, corn, oil and wine was intended to represent the diverse "cultural ingredients" of Queen's past and the tradition of cornerstone laying ceremonies.

This was one of the aspects of the ceremony intended to parallel the opening of Kingston City Hall in June, 1843.

The ritual was not readily grasped by all the spectators present, many of whom were unable to keep a straight face throughout. It left one woman in the audience wondering, "who's going to clean that all up?"

Smith then closed and locked the end plate, presenting the key for safekeeping to the president of the Alumni Association, David Whiting.

McLatchie looked forward to the fall of 1994, when the group would once again assemble for the official opening of the Joseph S. Stauffer library.

McLatchie reminded the spectators that they had participated in a "magical event." Anticipating a sombre closing statement, the crowd hushed and waited.

McLatchie continued, "The human race can be divided into two categories, those who know what a plinth is, and those who do not."

He said that he considered all present as the select few who now shared the knowledge - the knowledge that the "plinth" is the large stone situated at the corner of the library which contains a piece of Queen's history.

Cars damaged

Napier told The Journal that "the impromptu celebration after the Blue Jays game was not like the street parties" of old.

He said that the gathering on University Avenue was more of a celebration than a street party, and said that while the activity itself was unlawful, police "turned a blind eye because people were celebrating all over Canada."

However, Napier was quick to note that the permissiveness of police this year "doesn't speak to the fact that we are condoning street parties."

Others were not favourably impressed with the party.

One longtime resident of University Avenue was surprised to see three nude men and a nude woman in her backyard late Saturday night.

"I have never seen so many people on the street," she said. The woman reported that there were people standing on her verandah.

Revelers climbed onto her roof, tampered with the house's electrical wiring, and damaged eavestroughs, a garden shed and her car, a 1991 Crown Victoria. She was inside her house with her grandchildren at the time.

The woman said that when she first phoned the police they did not respond. When she phoned a second time, "they asked me if I owned the house and I said yes. They asked me if I really owned the house ... in two seconds there must have been five policemen that came to my door," she said.

The resident said that she did not press trespassing charges against any of the naked frolickers in her backyard. "I felt bad because I thought they were students and this was homecoming weekend," she said.

However, she said she thought they were alumni after finding a hotel key in her backyard on Sunday morning.

The woman said that she and her husband are now facing a $200 deductible on their house and car insurance. "We were minding our own business ... it's not fair," she said.

"I wouldn't want to go through again what I went through last night. I was just really scared," she said.

Micheal Allibon, an Arts '92 grad in town for the weekend, returned from a downtown bar to discover "about 15 people" dancing on his Honda Accord, which was left parked outside a friend's house on University south of Johnson.

Sunday morning, evaluating the damage, Allibon noticed "scratches all over the car ... the hood is dented in, the roof is dented."

"It's kind of hard to assess the damage," he said, predicting that he would wind up paying the $500 deductible, and that the total "could be several thousand dollars."

"I'm quite angry," he said. "I like having a good time, but this is really disturbing. It's terrible."

Allibon talked to the police immediately after the incident, but "they said 'this stuff happens' ... I wasn't terribly impressed," he said.

As a graduate student in Toronto, Allibon said, "I have no income. I'm taking a $500 hit for something I didn't even do."

Howard Pearce, director of Queen's Security and Parking, said that overall he was "extremely pleased ... there were precious few incidents on Queen's property of an adverse nature."

Pearce said that Queen's security "provides an enormous amount of extra security" over the entire area where Queen's owns houses.

Queen's security reported a couple of trespass charges at the football game and dealt with damage to cars on Union street, Pearce said.

Nevertheless, Pearce was satisfied with the weekend's unfoldings "in the context of what happened on campus," and said that "various committees have done an excellent job putting the whole weekend in perspective in terms of what it means to the university."

According to Sergeant Napier, this year's street parties were "much more cooperative, much less antagonistic toward police."

"The amount of liquor visible was down compared with the past, and drunken and disorderly [conduct] was also down," he said.

The number of charges laid by police was also down this year.

According to Napier, police passed out 60 tickets for public drinking, as well as one Traffic Act charge, one trespass to the Property Act charge, and three Criminal Code charges for failing to cooperate with police and misidentification.

"There is always a small percentage that wish to make it difficult for everybody else," said Napier, noting that there was also some damage in couple of areas and a great number of smashed beer bottles.

Napier noted that hundreds more charges could have been laid, but added "the vast majority charged with liquor [offences] were not Queen's students."

Most were people from out of town who "came down because they heard Kingston was a bit of a hoot," Napier said, adding that perhaps some student education on the behaviour of guests would alleviate the problem.

been other threats associated with Surface in the past, directed at ASUS members and Surface writers and editors.

"My concern is the society, not ourselves. We came into the job knowing there would be contentious issues. But if the society suffers that's not okay," she said.

Grant notified the Kingston City Police about the calls on Sunday evening.

Although he was originally told that unless he feared for his life he should wait and call the next day, the Kingston City Police responded to his call shortly thereafter.

"They did handle it well and I don't expect anything more from them," Grant said.

Kingston City Police Sergeant Bob Napier told The Journal that the police take all calls of this nature "very, very seriously."

He said that it is very difficult to find the perpetrators "without some sort of mechanism in place to detect where the call was made from."

Napier suggested that the calls could be from an anti-Surface group or a pro-Surface group. "But that doesn't necessarily mean it's not a rogue from outside either."

"The vast majority of [this kind of call] is people blowing smoke," Napier commented, but at the same time, "you don't know what the emotions are" behind the call.

He also said that "printing a story [on the threats] doesn't allow it to die off ... press and publicity gives them the attention they want."

"Can they not stand up publicly and say what they mean?" he asked.

Harvard prof charts history of college women

BY TARA ROY
The Queen's Journal

Last Thursday, the department of economics was host to Claudia Goldin, the 1993 William A. Mackintosh speaker. Goldin, an economics professor at Harvard University, spoke of a new revolution brewing among women in today's colleges and universities.

In her lecture, "The Meaning of College in the Lives of Women: the Past 100 Years," Goldin described the revolution as "really quite simple—a demand to have a life with a career and a family. It's not like the sixties, but what is going on is just as emotional."

According to Goldin, who is also the director of a special program at the American National Bureau of Economic Research, today's women are different because their predecessors wanted other things from their education, and ultimately had to choose between a career and a family.

Now, women want both at the same time. "I've never seen a generation that could point their finger at the problem and say it so bluntly," she said.

To women of the nineties, college holds true equality between the sexes, but after graduation, they question the timing of career and family, she said.

Goldin explained that these women feel that if they have a career first, they will be too old to have a family. Conversely, if they have a family first then men will take the higher level jobs, and their own careers will be at a dead end. These women are frustrated, and that is the source of the revolution, according to Goldin.

In her presentation, she said that today's college women expect to encounter a "level playing field," where "barriers have been considerably reduced, not zero, just considerably reduced."

Goldin said that while there is "virtual parity at the beginning of a job," women feel they still have to fight for equality in life's rewards. Women find that the barrier comes when they have families, she said, and childcare is a major part of the barrier.

Goldin has conducted extensive research on the roles women and children have played in economic history. She collected data on what college has meant to women over the past 100 years, dividing this information into five groups of college women, each of which attended college in different epochs.

She called these five groups "cohorts," and established three "main cohorts" and two "bridging cohorts" that "bring history along."

In Goldin's analysis, the first main cohort graduated between 1900 and 1920, and wanted a family or a career. Of the women in this group, one third never married, and of those who did marry, one third of them had no children.

It was at this time that college administrations, aware of the low marriage rate, introduced programs like home economics and household science, Goldin noted.

Commenting on the appropriateness of these terms, Goldin said, "household science" is a wonderful term—sort of like "sanitary engineers."

The next cohort was of the bridge variety, and graduated between 1920 and 1940. These women wanted a job, then a family, Goldin said, noting that these women sought jobs and not careers.

The second main cohort graduated between 1945 and 1960. Unlike their predecessors, Goldin explained, they wanted a family, then a job.

College became a "marriage market—the probability of meeting a future mate skyrocketed," said Goldin. Ninety-four per cent of these women married within five years after graduation.

In this situation, she said, "GI Joe met Jane," not at the yacht club as in the 1920's, but at college.

The second bridging group graduated between 1970 and 1990. These women, our role models and mothers, wanted a career, then a family, Goldin said.

She classified the current college generation as the final main cohort. The women in this group want both a family and career, Goldin said, and they want a man who wants the same things as they do. Only 10 per cent of the women in this cohort say they do not want children, she added.

Goldin believes that the current generation of college women states "honestly and directly what it wants," but knows that having both a family and a career "has been impossible to previous generations."

Grant Lewis, who introduced

Goldin, said that of the 19 speakers who have visited Queen's since 1979, one third of them went on to be awarded the Nobel Prize in Economics.

Goldin was the editor of the Journal of Economic History for four years, and is currently on the editorial board of another influential publication, Exploration of Economic History. She was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship and is vice-president of the American Economic Association.

Jays spoil clean-up

BY ADAM EMERY
The Queen's Journal

Almost anyone on campus would wholeheartedly agree that having the Blue Jays win the World Series on the Saturday night of homecoming weekend is perfect timing. Anyone, that is, except Bryan McKenzie, the Alumni Weekend Chair.

On Sunday morning, there were plans to organize a clean-up of the streets around campus and the student neighbourhood after the homecoming festivities were over. Unfortunately, almost no one attended.

"There was an effort to get people out [Sunday] morning with prizes and a free brunch. We were hoping for support from the faculty societies, but I guess everyone's sleeping late after the Blue Jays victory," he said.

McKenzie characterized the low turnout as "another under-attended event."

Alison Mitchell, the Alma Mater Society Campus Activities Commissioner, stressed the need for Queen's to keep the streets clean. "After a big weekend there is lots of garbage," she said. "It is our responsibility to clean up the student ghetto area."

While there was disappointment that the turnout for this event was low, no one was surprised. McKenzie admitted that "some of [the Alumni Weekend] events weren't very well attended."

However, Kim Barrett, the Events Chair, said "the pep rally and the charity barbeque were well attended and went very well."

Alumna lauded for life of service

BY ELIZABETH IRELAND
The Queen's Journal

On Saturday night, one of Queen's distinguished alumni was honoured with the Alumni Achievement Award at a ceremony in the John Deutsch University Centre.

Freda Paltiel, who is the retired senior advisor on the Status of Women for Health and Welfare Canada, was presented with the prestigious distinction, which recognizes both outstanding professional achievements and the maintenance of voluntary commitments.

Paltiel is an Arts '45 graduate who specialized in politics and psychology. She attended Queen's during the war years, and described the school as a "Shangri-la" amidst the outside world.

Paltiel, a Canadian leader in human rights issues, told The Journal that the main concerns for women today are the threat of poverty, gender-based violence, gender gaps in status and income, the bias against women in health research and lack of childcare.

She also said that aging presents a poignant threat to women, as many older women are being left "alone, institutionalized and widowed."

In her quest to enhance equality and justice, Paltiel has worked to establish pensions to recognize women's work in the home. She herself spent ten years at home raising her four children.

"Women's issues are societal issues," she said.

Paltiel said that she is disappointed by the current "backlash against gains made towards equality," and blamed a society that is still "unwelcoming to change."

She cited engineering and medicine as areas where women are still under-represented, and described certain institutions as "not welcoming" to women.

However, Paltiel said that she was happy that "pregnancy is no longer legal grounds for discrimination," as childbearing serves "an important social function."

Paltiel told The Journal that despite these problems, Canada remains the envy of other countries.

"Canada is a country with a small population, a large land mass and a harsh climate," she said. "We have survived through our interdependence, our responsibility to one another and our welcoming diversity."

When asked to comment on the federal election, Paltiel called herself "issues-oriented," and said she had no party affiliation.

However, she hopes "the new government is conscious of what Canadians hold dear," and that the elected party forms a "transparent and responsible government" capable of achieving an active and interactive democracy.

"In my view," Paltiel said, "our social programs are the glue of Canadian society, and if we abandon them we will become unstuck."

After Queen's, Paltiel went on to attend McGill and the Hebrew University Medical School in Jerusalem before she began her 26-year career with the federal government.

As an expert in the fields of health and social policy, she was Canada's first advisor on the Status of Women, and wrote the 1972 Report on the Status of Women.

She spent two years on the Canadian Privy Council and worked closely with both the World Health Organization and UNICEF. When Paltiel served on the Pan-American Council, she was affectionately nicknamed "the Godmother of women's health and development."

Since retiring at the end of March, Paltiel has begun work on a global study entitled Coming of Age in the Metropolis, which focuses on the lives of 12 to 14 year old girls in 12 cities around the world, "at all stages of development."

Paltiel has founded an endowment for Queen's Nursing faculty and students towards research on behalf of disadvantaged women.

Looking back, Paltiel said that she was always proud to represent Canada on her travels, and called Queen's "a good start to it all."

question the Reform Party helped us, and that was easily predictable," he said.

The Liberals' first priority will be jobs, Milliken said. He will be "getting the municipal infrastructure program off the ground, and the changes to the Small Business Act" as soon as the Liberals take over, he said.

"The main thing for Kingston is to pursue the national agenda, and see that it works for our community. And I'll be making Kingston's voice heard there," Milliken promised.

Regarding university students, he noted, "the thing that would be a priority with me is to get the interest-free loan period [after graduation] extended again to six months."

Local Progressive Conservative candidate Barry Gordon was in good spirits on Monday night, despite his party's devastating defeat at the polls.

"Relieved is a good word," Gordon said, describing his reaction to the campaign.

Asked whether Canadians were voting against parties in this election out of frustration, rather than showing positive support for parties, Gordon said there "was definitely some of that."

However, Gordon noted that the significant majority for the Liberals pointed to the fact that they were offering something people found "very exciting [and] dynamic."

Gordon, who has only been a member of the Conservatives for about four months, surmised that there would likely be changes in store for the Tories, but was confident the changes will be constructive in the long run.

"Out of the biggest changes," he said, "come the biggest challenges."

Gordon wanted to express "thanks to all the students who worked so hard [for the PC Party] and voted for PC's."

On the subject of his status as local PC candidate, Gordon said it was "too early to call," but affirmed that the campaign has been "a little older and more informed."

Mary Ann Higgs, the local NDP candidate, came in fourth in the riding.

Higgs pointed out that although the NDP were dealt a blow in the election, so were all the parties. "The Liberal sweep was not a celebration of all the other parties," she said.

Higgs called the Liberals "a more palatable alternative" to the Conservative rule.

She is hopeful that the New Democratic platform will not disappear with the lost parliamentary seats. Instead, she said, the Liberal agenda will include some of the NDP policies and values of the New Democrats.

However, Higgs said that she was afraid that after the Liberals took the books, they might tell the story that "their own modest proposals are not do-able."

Celebrating the Liberal victory at the Ambassador Hotel, Milliken said, "if anything it was a wide margin than I'd expected."

Regarding the support for Bloc Quebecois in Quebec, he said he actually knew Walter Light "as far as I know, it's less than expected. They've got their seats, but there were expectations they might do better than that. They've been contained very well by us."

Milliken said, "the Conservatives had the milestone of Mulroney around their neck. It hadn't been for Brian Mulroney wouldn't have had the Reform Party or the Bloc Quebecois."

The successful incumbent said he will take "only one day off before getting caught up on e-mail."

Engineers celebrate centennial

Open house welcomes visitors

BY KATHY GOLDER
The Queen's Journal

Queen's Engineers were strutting their stuff over the weekend as the Faculty of Applied Science held a series of open houses to help celebrate its 100th birthday.

Across campus, each department in engineering held its own open house with a variety of demonstrations, displays, short lectures and tours which were attended by alumni, Queen's students, the public, and high school students.

Professor Sam Lazier, who was an organizer for the civil engineering open house, said he was "delighted with the number of alumni that had seen," and he expressed that "all in all... it's been quite a good success."

The mining engineering department presented an opportunity to see real gold, while the Miller Museum of Geology featured a display of dinosaur bones, as well as an extensive rock and mineral collection. Visitors could also take a hands-on look at an earthquake-measuring seismograph.

At the physics open house, visitors could take a guided tour of various laboratories like the Van de Graaff particle accelerator and the Millikelvin cryogenics laboratory, which, incidentally, is the coldest place in Canada at one millionth of a degree above absolute zero.

The engineering chemistry open house included a lecture demonstration that resurrected experiments which were done 50 years ago. "They were very old-fashioned, but they were spectacular," said Dr. Ken Russell, a retired professor who headed the organizing committee for the event.

Many of the demonstrations had appeal for all ages. Some pre-school-aged children said that it was "very exciting," and "like fire works."

High school students from Kingston and as far away as Montreal, Ottawa, and Toronto attended the open house. While Friday proved much quieter in terms of attendance, the influx of the alumni on Saturday made for another busy from Queen's. He was a Gold Medal Winner from the Department of Electrical Engineering and president of Northern Telecom.

Prof. Lazier also commented on the fact that both graduate and undergraduate students "responded tremendously to act as guides and to stand by various experiments."

Planning for this event began last November, when committees from each department were struck. Not only professors were involved in organizing the open house.

Sean Sterling, a third-year civil engineering student, was involved in organizing the civil open house. The student organizers began about a month ago, Sterling said.

Their job involved getting volunteers to act as guides, and to run experiments and explain their operation to guests at the open house.

Also present was Women in Science and Engineering (WISE), which has been active in promoting and supporting women in engineering at Queen's.

Professors Ron Hirshorn and Wen Cebuhar expressed excitement about the great amount of interest the high school students showed in the lectures.

Walter Light Hall featured a robotics lab, a fibre optics demonstration, and screenings of the movies Alladin and The Jungle Book.

The hall was also the home of an information booth on Queen's Solar Vehicle Team and Sun-QUEST, the solar car, which was demonstrated on University Avenue and at Richardson Stadium at half-time of the homecoming game on Saturday.

Dr. Ivan Campbell, the head of the department of civil engineering, said that the open house "is important to give [public and high] school kids and alumni a chance to see what's going on [in the field] at this minute... things are changing pretty rapidly."

Alumni walk proud at Science '48's 45th reunion. Marika Olickman

ANDREW CASH
Acclaimed singer/songwriter Andrew Cash first made a musical splash with seminal Toronto punk outfit L'Etranger in the early '80s. Five years and three EPs later, Andrew went solo, soon signing with prestigious label Island. His Time And Place and Boomtown albums reflected his evolution as a songwriter, and he now greets us with his finest work yet, Hj (on Sumo Productions/MCA). "We wanted to capture the actual sound of the band," explains Andrew. The power of Cash and his new band can now be witnessed on their extensive tour with Spirit Of The West.

Clearcut ideas about Clayoquot

This summer, protestors at Clayoquot Sound in British Columbia decided that civil disobedience was the most effective way to get their anti-logging message across to the public and the B.C. government.

Groups of protestors repeatedly and persistently blockaded logging roads in an attempt to 'up the ante' in the dispute between BC logging companies and environmentalists. As a consequence of these blockades, more than 750 protestors were arrested and subsequently sentenced to up to 45 days in jail and given fines of between $1,500 and $3,000. These fines seem extremely harsh given the relatively peaceful and non-violent nature of the crime.

The judge who sentenced some of the protestors characterized them as young and naive, unable to recognize that their goals could be accomplished through the 'proper channels.' But maybe these protestors, rather than being naive, were in fact jaded and cynical enough to recognize that the legal and political systems in Canada may not always operate in the interests of the environment.

As Canadians we have a history of peaceful and lawful political activity. When we cast a ballot in federal, provincial and municipal elections, we can be reasonably confident that politicians will pay heed to our opinions as their constituents. Alternatively we can organize into interest or lobby groups to promote a collective agenda. We usually take for granted that these avenues of representation are sufficient.

But in the case of Clayoquot Sound, and environmental issues in general, it is necessary to reassess the effectiveness of this system of representation.

If we conceive of the environment and its future inhabitants as invisible constituents, the liberal democratic system of 'one person, one vote' breaks down. The political system isn't equipped to represent future generations' interests, and as such does a great disservice to the environmental cause, which is based on the idea that the massive costs of environmental degradation will be incurred in the future rather than the present.

If the system by its very nature cannot incorporate and represent the interests of environmentalists, shouldn't we try to change the way interests are represented within a liberal democracy?

The problem is that what is required is a fundamental shift in mentality, in the way citizens express interests and especially in the way politicians respond to them. These transformations cannot be accomplished by legislating institutional changes. Instead, society must be transformed through increased awareness of the dangers of environmental degradation. Protests such as the ones mounted this summer at Clayoquot Sound are the best way to accomplish this.

This is not to say that environmental interests are the only ones that should be listened to in this debate. Valid concerns about the loss of jobs incurred by reducing clearcutting have been raised. Loggers working on the land are not amoral, destructive people; they have jobs to do and families to support. But there is a way to reconcile the interests of loggers and environmentalists through the development of proposals for sustainable development. In fact, loggers would like to be able to sustain the forests, at least insofar as this would provide better job security.

The real 'villains' in this whole conflict are the logging corporations, whose interests lie primarily in generating immediate profits.

Until governments and politicians can convince environmentalists and First Nations people that their interests will be listened to and acted upon within the current legal and political frameworks, illegal acts of civil disobedience such as those that occurred this summer at Clayoquot Sound are justified.

Don't get with The Program

The movie The Program, released by Walt Disney Co., is garnering more attention than one would expect. It's not because of the movie, but the way some people are reacting to it.

Three football players in the United States decided to reenact a scene in the movie in which players lie on a highway dividing line in order to prove their manhood. One is dead, the other two are critically injured.

Disney quickly responded by cutting the scene from the movie.

To many it seems ridiculous that Disney would cut the scene. If people are going to be that stupid, let them be. If they're going to be that easily influenced, let them be. If they want to blame their actions on Disney, tell them to stop looking for a scapegoat. It's time people took responsibility for their own actions. To some extent these sentiments are valid.

It may seem that Disney acted out of monetary self-interest. It may seem that Disney took the easy way out. Some of us would have liked to have seen a court battle to put an end to this nonsense.

But is it really all nonsense? In a litigation prone culture dominated by a blame-assigning approach to problem solving, one can understand the motivations behind Disney's quick action.

Walt Disney Co. has a mandate to provide quality entertainment for young people. Knowing that a scene in one of their movies led to at least one accidental death cannot be a comforting thought to the people at Disney. However, although removing the scene was a wise move, it was not necessarily the best move. On a broader scale, should the threat of litigation be the determining factor in what is included in film? Given, The Program is not high art, but should any filmmaker be limited to what he or she thinks the public will not copy? Obvious correlations to other films can be made - such as Stand By Me or Heathers. Should these films have scenes removed if someone tries to copy them?

The threat of litigation is in itself a form of censorship. Books and lyrics to rock and rap songs have been repressed by the public. Movies are rated, and that in itself should be enough, (though many claim the ratings are not strict enough already).

It is sad to see public energies directed at removing a scene of a bunch of football players lying on a dividing line from a Walt Disney movie. Certainly there are more important offences that could be addressed. An offence like violent pornography is much more dangerous because it creates a climate in which that behaviour seems acceptable.

Cutting a small scene out of The Program may protect a few idealistic football players or other tough guys, but in all it is only a minor gesture. Society should be concerned with other problems, problems like the peer pressure that leads to such acts, problems like pornography.

Whether life imitates art or vice versa is not the question. Movies like books and musical recordings are social documents. Even if they were all void of violence, they would not mean our society would not be a violent one.

OPENFORUM

The truth surfaces

The Editor,
I am writing to express my disappointment with the results of the ASUS referendum on Surface, and in particular with the comments made in Tuesday, Oct. 19's Journal by the leaders of the No Campaign, Andrew Dick and Michael Carnegie. It seems that now that these people have effectively succeeded in shutting down Surface, they feel free to show their true colours on the issue. Dick, Carnegie et al never really had any interest in seeing Surface continue in its present form, or in any form that would remotely present marginalized groups. I find it amusing that Dick says, "Surface is not the only voice for marginalized groups." Where are the other voices on campus? And since when has Dick been the authority on this issue?

Furthermore, I think the anti-Surface leaders' remarks reflect an ignorance about the role of campus media in general. Carnegie said in The Journal that it would be preferable for ASUS to have "A bit of power over the Editor." The media are supposed to be generating discussion using independent information, they are not meant to be controlled like puppets by student governments. How can minorities be represented by majoritarian student governments?

Nevertheless, we should be wary of presuming to speak for everyone on this issue. In our central Canadian academic enclave, it is easy to resort to 'regional cultural imperialism' and to tell loggers what their real interests should be. But by the same token, we should recognize that loggers' interests aren't the only important local interests to be reckoned with. The strong anti-logging stance of the First Nations people in Clayoquot Sound has been largely ignored by the B.C. government and logging companies, indicating that they are only partly committed to defending local interests.

Until governments and politicians can convince environmentalists and First Nations people that their interests will be listened to and acted upon within the current legal and political frameworks, illegal acts of civil disobedience such as those that occurred this summer at Clayoquot Sound are justified.

Finally, people should be made aware that Andrew Dick himself is quoted as saying that Surface is "something that's bad." And all along they made us think that they simply didn't feel right about paying fifty-nine cents for the paper! The truth is these people opposed Surface because they didn't agree with its progressive message, they don't think anyone should be exposed to that 'agenda', and frankly, disagree with the whole concept of funding marginalized groups.

Final warning

The Editor,
This letter concerns an issue that has been bothering me for some time. It is the issue of students who feel the need to wear clothing denoting names of other universities. These students feel the need to wear their U of T jackets, their Western caps and their McGill sweatshirts around the Queen's campus. THE NERVE! I believe this type of behaviour is totally inappropriate. I propose that a policy be instituted whereby these students would be burned at the stake. I consider myself a tolerant person, but think about it: Did you ever see Michael Jordan show up for a game in a Lakers jacket? Have you ever seen Kim Campbell uttering up "Vote for Jean Chretien" posters? Have you ever seen Cito Gaston sporting a Phillies cap? No you have not. With this in mind I will issue my final warning. All students who choose to sport non-Queen's clothing, SMARTEN UP!

The Sun Sets On Us (for R., R. and J.)

Your arms burst forward, strong in all directions, cutting the air to redding ribbons and my legs cry out for us to stop but you cannot hear me where you are.

Your voice is flung back, carelessly, and I catch it, clumsy and stunned again and I toss it back, but underhand, and you drop it, unprepared, unaware.

And we sit at last in contemplation each to one side of a sun-blistered bench and a halo of flies does homage at once around my flat and your knotted hair.

And the sun sets on us, with mercy at last, down by the harbour where nightly pass ships and I idly dream of an ocean that has you and I know that at midnight we will sail out alone.

Unworthy Deaths (for too many)

I have seen the rolls of unworthy deaths
as I roll and toss in uneased dead sleep.

I have watched as flesh returned to bone without distance I could not but long to feel.

I have held in my arms an unworthy death and valued the life some had ended before.

I have heard and read and written their words in case they were taken to scrub of all sense.

And I will not have one more - and yet I will.
Like a wilderness tramp, I cannot must go on.

Men, women, children gone and with them
some of me.

Must it be the death of you before you see the worth?

I have called the rolls of unworthy deaths
but in my dreams they do not respond.

And I work for the day there are no more and for the day to grieve is not the norm.

I have called the rolls of unworthy deaths,
but in my dreams; they do not respond.

Shattered glass

In a Glass House
Nino Ricci
McClelland and Stewart

Nino Ricci found surprising success in 1990 with his first novel, Lives of the Saints. The book was initially ignored by the large publishing companies, and was primed instead by Cormorant Books. It soon won international praise and awards, including the Governor General's Award for Fiction, and spent over a year atop The Globe and Mail's bestseller list.

It is unfortunate that Ricci's new book, In a Glass House, will inevitably be compared to Lives of the Saints, because for many readers it will not surpass that masterful first book. Yet on its own terms, the new novel is impressive - it offers Ricci's superb clarity of style with a new, yet connected, tale.

The novel, the second in a trilogy, continues the life story of Vittorio Innocente. Vittorio, who tells the story first-person, arrives in Halifax after a hellish trans-Atlantic crossing from Italy, during which his mother bleeds to death after giving birth to an illegitimate daughter. (The tale of young Vittorio and his adulterous mother in Italy is the subject of Lives of the Saints.) The daughter, later named Rita, becomes the source of immense shame for Vittorio's father, Mario. She herself suffers greatly, the blameless product of a past indiscretion.

After travelling with Mario by train from Halifax, Vittorio and Rita arrive in Mersea, a fictional farming community in southwestern Ontario. There, they live with Mario on his farm. The area is home to various Italian immigrants, some of whom are the Innocente's family or friends from Italy.

Confused and angry over the arrival of his son and Rita, Mario takes to sleeping in the boiler room, neglecting his family to the point where they have no food. He is a cruel man, and the house is uneasily quiet because of him. When Rita grows fond of a farm dog, Mario does not hesitate to kill the pet and savagely beat Rita. However, Rita transcends this horrible world. She becomes friends with a girl at school and soon winds up moving in with her, even becoming officially adopted by her friend's family.

Vittorio shuffles through the school system unhappily. He is insecure and always moodily introspective - the boy who sits alone and goes out of his way to avoid meeting people. He makes half-efforts, but finds "no reward for trying to follow out what seemed the careful, ruthless logic of fitting in." He cannot conform to the normalcy which he perceives all around him. He flirts with drinking and sex in high school, but remains always unhappy and full of doubt. In his first year of university, in Toronto, he becomes a daily pot-smoker and considers suicide, before seeking out psychoanalysis and getting back on track.

After university, Vittorio goes to Africa to teach English. He finds that despite travelling across the ocean, he cannot escape his loneliness. After two years in Nigeria, his father dies, and Vittorio returns to Canada.

The book closes with Vittorio having inherited his father's wealth, for despite Mario's lifelong sadness, his farm has brought considerable prosperity. Vittorio seems hopeful as he leaves the farm, uncertain where his life will lead him next, but free of past burdens.

In a Glass House portrays a disturbing family situation and the brutal alienation of a son from his father. Vittorio may pass through various phases in his life, but he always feels disconnected from the world around him. He finds that this is true whether he's at home, at wonderfully readable. But the novel, like Vittorio himself, seems disappointed and uneasy. The African part is in many ways not linked to the main story - only the letters between Vittorio and his family in Canada establish it as part of the same novel. Furthermore, the novel's conclusion seems somehow incomplete and untidy.

Yet perhaps this untidiness best suits the story of Vittorio's confused youth. The novel may lack rigid cohesiveness, but it is a compelling story and is full of insights. In some ways it is a shattering of the immigrant's dream. In Lives of the Saints, the Italian villagers see Canada as a dreamland, where phones are mandatory in every room and houses are warm enough to walk around naked year-round. Yet in this novel, the harshness of Vittorio's experiences destroys those ideals.

BROCK MARTLAND is an assistant news editor at The Journal and claims that he is a sensitive Albertan.

Sports

Tale of two teams: the Gaels and the Jays

BY GEOFF OWEN
The Queen's Journal

There is a great deal of irony about the major sporting events that occurred on Alumni Weekend. Two teams, the Queen's Golden Gaels and the Toronto Blue Jays, ended their quests to repeat as champions. The similarities end there.

Where Toronto's season was very good, even perfect, Queen's season was very bad.

Toronto won the World Series on the strength of a Joe Carter home run in the ninth inning against one of the best relievers in baseball, Mitch Williams, over one of the best teams in baseball, the Philadelphia Phillies.

Queen's lost to the McGill Redmen 37-24, thus ending their season with a record of 2-5. The Gaels failed to make the playoffs for the first time in 16 years.

Last year, Toronto won the World Series with tremendous performances by Dave Winfield, Jimmy Key, Candy Maldonado, and Tom Henke. But these players left the Jays for various reasons to play for other teams. The voids created by their absences were filled by players like Paul Molitor, Dave Stewart, Rickey Henderson and Pat Hentgen.

The Gaels, too, were champions last year, they had a stellar season.

Where the Blue Jays got inspired, hungry performances from Molitor and the like this year, the Gaels got very little. Nobody stepped up to lead the Gaels back to the playoffs, let alone a national championship. There were some outstanding individual performances for the Gaels. Most notably, Ed Kidd, Paul Kozan, Tim Ware and Mark Johnson; but there was no team continuity, no collective drive, no hunger. For the 1992 Queen's Golden Gaels, complacency reigned supreme.

On Saturday, the Jays went way ahead and then fell behind. In the ninth inning, with two on, Carter hit his home run that will long be remembered as one of the most magical moments in the history of baseball, indeed the history of sport. The Blue Jays never gave up — at no point was anything lost.

Likewise, the Gaels showed some inspiration of their own. They fell behind 17-0 but battled back to tie the game at halftime. Sadly, in the second half, the Gaels gave up 20 points before they tried their own comeback attempt; but there was no Joe Carter. They lost 37-24 to end one of the poorest showings for a Golden Gael team in their storied history. This all coming off one of the strongest, proudest showings ever.

One of the hardest things to do in sports is to repeat as champions. This season, if anything good came of it for the Gaels, should act as a reminder of exactly how precious winning a championship is.

If it is better to have loved and lost than to never have loved at all, then it is certainly better to have won a national championship and lost the next season than not to have won at all. Second year running back Tyler Kudar put it in perspective: "Although I wasn't a big part of [winning the Vanier Cup], I realize how fortunate I was just to be there. I don't think you can understand while it's happening, how truly special it is. But as time goes on, especially in the light of our disappointments this year, last year's success will become even more special."

So the Jays and the Gaels are both done for now. One is going to long be remembered as one of the best teams ever. The other has to watch as schools like Concordia, Guelph and Acadia compete to reach the success that, last year, they achieved.

Hoops anyone?

BY ROB THOMPSON
The Queen's Journal

The men's basketball Gaels took the court against the McMaster Marauders to conclude the Alumni Weekend. The marauders demonstrated why they were CIAU runner-ups last year as they handily defeated the home side 89-56.

The game started as a sloppy affair. Both teams committed several early turnovers, and scoring was hard to come by. The game saw-sawed for the first ten minutes, with neither team claiming a decisive edge. At the ten minute mark the momentum took a huge swing in McMaster's favour. Shawn Francis threw down a tomahawk jam, and from that point it was all Marauders.

McMaster built up a lead, and at the close of the first half were up by a 37-26 tally. They employed a stingy zone defense which allowed the Gaels only one field goal in the last seven minutes of the half. During that stretch the Gaels were outscored 24-10.

The second half provided more of the same. McMaster came out running, forcing the Gaels into committing foul after foul. McMaster had the bonus within six and half minutes, and two minutes later entered the penalty situation. This contributed to a 14-3 run that put the game out of reach.

An exclamation point was put on the Marauder victory when centre Jack Vanderpool capped a fast break with a thunderous jam to put Mac up 72-41. McMaster was content from that point on to allow the clock to run down, as they brought most of the bench in with a 5:52 to play.

McMaster used their superior speed to put points on the board, but the real key to their success was their relentless defense that rarely gave Queen's any inside scoring chances. This forced the Gaels to rely on the outside shooting of guard Wyeth Clarkson who led the Gaels with 14 points. Clarkson's efforts aside, the Marauders were too much for the Gaels on the day, as they had five players scoring in double figures.

Other scorers for Queen's were Mike Ruschitt with 12 points, 10 in the first half, and Mark Holland with 9. Freshman Rich Cook came off the bench with 7, Roger Wheeler added 7, and Sean Smith contributed 4. Finally, Corwin Crambray chipped in with 3. McMaster's leading scorer was Paul Maga with 14.

McMaster, who are returning many starters from last year's CIAU finalist squad, should be a force to be reckoned with in their conference this year. They do not appear on the Gaels schedule for the rest of the year, but look for the Marauders to be there come playoff time in March.

Despite the loss, the Gaels have no reason to despair. They have a strong core of talented young players. Look for a great improvement as the year progresses. No doubt they will prove to be competitive with any team in the OUA East division.

This weekend coming up the Gaels will be hosting the Frank Tindall Tournament. Teams participating include UNB, Laurier and Bishop's. The Gaels take on the UNB Redshirts at 8:00pm on Friday, the 6:00pm game features Laurier and Bishop's. The consolation game goes Saturday at 6:00pm with the championship to follow at 8:00pm. All games are in the Bartlett Gym in the PEC.

Gaels drop home opener

They still boast a winning record

BY PRENTIS CLAIRMONT
The Queen's Journal

Joe who? The Blue Jays may have stolen the spotlight the night before, but the men's hockey team was certainly a tough opponent for the Concordia Stingers on Sunday afternoon. Unfortunately, the Gaels couldn't hold on to a 1-0 lead and lost their home opener 3-1.

The first period was a tight-checking defensive struggle. Game MVP Bill Budgell electrified the homecoming crowd with a crushing hit at centre ice.

Both teams had numerous power play opportunities, but were thwarted by superior goal-tending. Queen's goalie Bill Landry stood on his head during the first period, stopping the Stingers at every chance.

The game was won in the second period. Queen's jumped out to a 1-0 lead early on. Alan Bucher scored his first goal of the season by tucking Dan Brown's rebound upstairs over the Concordia netminder. Concordia finally solved Bill Landry with two quick goals near the end of the second. The Gaels fell short in the third. They had several decent scoring chances, but could not capitalize. Concordia added another goal to make the final score 3-1.

Queen's record now stands at 2-1-0. They will certainly need an all out team effort if they hope to improve on that next weekend. The Gaels travel to Guelph to meet the upstart Gryphons. Head coach John Phelan admitted that the team needed to play a tougher checking game in their own end.

The Gaels next home game is Saturday Nov. 6, at 3:00pm. Attendance was impressive on Sunday and the team wants to continue packing the house.

Ed Kidd: A bright light in an otherwise dismal season. Morika Glickman

Women's hoops sweep alumnae, Waterloo

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

Three for three! The new season began smoothly for the Queen's women's basketball Gaels on the weekend. The Gaels scored a convincing 73-37 win over the University of Waterloo Athenas on Sunday in their first exhibition game. This victory followed two one-sided Homecoming triumphs over alumnae players. Queen's could attain their first-ever top-ten ranking if they play at this level through their exhibition schedule.

The Gaels were in control from the start, dominating all facets of the game against the overmatched Athenas. Queen's rode superior quickness, intensity, anticipation and execution to win handily, despite Waterloo's edge in size.

Gaels' All-Star post Vicki Wilson led all scorers on both teams with 24 points, and pulled down 11 rebounds to lead there as well. After three seasons, Wilson is already the Gaels' leading career scorer with 624 points in OWIAA league play. Political considerations aside, can an All-Canadian selection be far behind?

Queen's soph forward Ginger Howell turned into a scoring demon, nailing a career-best 13 points off the bench as she made her first five shots. Veteran post Trina Rasmussen hooped nine points and added four boards before getting into foul trouble. Strong games were turned in by point guard Jaylene Morrison, York transfer Cathy Amara, and vets Tanya McIntyre and Jennie Laughton. Waterloo was led by Susan Krus, who hit for 17 points and snagged nine rebounds. The Athenas shot an anemic 1-for-9 from the free-throw line, and connected on only 31 per cent of their field attempts, compared to 45 per cent for the Gaels.

Geoff Smith made a stellar debut as game announcer.

This game also marked the season start for the Queen's Competitive Cheerleading team. According to medal-winning coach Sandy Han, the Competitive Cheerleaders will appear at all women's and men's home basketball games, as they prepare to represent Queen's in the national finals to be held at SkyDome during Vanier Cup week. This very athletic, exuberant group made lots of noise.

Golden Gaels alumnae, bolstered by former varsity players from Brock, Hartford and Toronto universities, proved no match for the fired-up Queen's team in either alumnae game. The Gaels took their first game 79-48 on Friday night, and claimed the second 70-41 Saturday afternoon.

Queen's locks up playoff berth in field hockey

BY JILLIAN BOYD
The Queen's Journal

This past Friday, while the rest of Queen's was busy preparing themselves for homecoming weekend, the field hockey team was on a bus headed for Ottawa.

These three weekend games held the same significance for the field hockey Gaels as did the game against McGill for the football team. That is, the Gaels needed to accumulate as many points as possible in order to continue on into the finals the following weekend.

The team's first game was against the Waterloo Warriors mid-afternoon Friday. Although in their previous encounter this season the Warriors defeated the Gaels, Queen's was determined not to allow history to repeat itself.

In a brilliant example of team unity and determination, the Gaels thus held Waterloo to a scoreless tie. Impressive plays by Jen Speer, Marcia Gitley, and rookie Stefanie Westarp helped Queen's in picking up this badly needed point.

The Gaels' following game was against the Guelph Gryphons early Saturday morning. Undaunted by the frigid weather and the early hour, Queen's once again came out hard and strong against Guelph.

The strong defense of Julia Bars, Laila Brown, Shauna MacDonald and goalie Jen Purdy helped the Gaels in holding the Gryphons to another shutout and another scoreless tie.

Although confident after their two very successful games against Waterloo and Guelph, the Gaels were distressed to learn that their competition for getting into the finals (McGill) had beaten Waterloo. This McGill victory made the Gaels' next game against Western of the utmost importance. The Gaels needed to win or tie this game in order to ensure a spot in the finals.

The game against Western was, as always, very rough and very intense. The Gaels managed to play, however, perhaps one of the best games of their season as they successfully combined strong offensive aggression with solid defensive plays. Indeed, the Gaels were the first to score off a stunning shot by Sarah Waddock.

Western, however, had no intention of giving up and soon answered this goal with one of their own. Although a tie would have sufficed, Queen's desperately wanted the win, and Jill Boyd managed to slip the ball through the Western defense to score in the second half and win the game.

Contributing to the Gaels' win were the many notable plays made by Usha Kakaria, Louise Barclay, and Karen Natho.

The Gaels' successful weekend was also due to the contribution of Margriet Zwart and Krista Garforth, who braved the late-night bus to join their teammates for their Saturday games.

With the win against Western, Queen's ensured themselves a spot in the finals next weekend in Toronto.

The Pursuit of Happiness with Eric's Trip and Stonecutters
Jock Harty Arena
BY CHRISTIAN deBRUIJN
The Queen's Journal

The Alumni Weekend concert featuring Kingston's Stonecutters, Eric's Trip from Moncton and headliners The Pursuit Of Happiness was, despite the uncontrollable circumstance of the World Series game, a success.

People staying in to watch the baseball game, the probable sluggishness of people from Friday night, and the unfortunate fact that a majority of Queen's students are not into this type of music, were the reasons for Saturday night's low turn-out. It seemed at some points that the dancing "yellow jackets" outnumbered the people in the arena. (I mean is there really going to be a riot for these particular bands and at this event?) In spite of this, thanks and appreciation should be given to the entire Queen's Entertainment Agency staff for their hard work and for bringing us these three great bands.

The Stonecutters went on first and played a short ten-song set of numbers mostly from their impressive debut cassette Amazing Discoveries (which is available from PF Records or at finer music stores in the city). The line-up, featuring new bassist Jason Jolly (an original Seamonster and current member of The Shermans), seemed to be quite comfortable on the big stage and in the large venue, and, despite not getting a proper monitor check, they sounded well.

The highlights of the Stonecutters' set was the unreleased "Pyro-Texas" featuring Chris Grismer, on vocals and glaring sonic guitars. The other song which caught my attention was "Glowing." The opening and closing bombardment of feedback courtesy of guitarist Peter Cassidy, combined with the Stonecutters' Goff Ward drumming to a different beat.

aggressive drumming style of Goff Ward, made for a great ending. Although they started out a bit slow, the Stonecutters seemed to get better as the night progressed. This is a band that will certainly get even better as time goes on.

Eric's Trip followed, opening with an unreleased track entitled (unofficially) "Girl Problem." The band then played "Need" off their release Peter. Despite the loudness of the sound system, guitarist Rick White and bassist Julie Doiron's vocal harmonies came out well. The most noticeable thing about the band was their rapport with the audience, whom they thanked, probably too many times, for coming out to see them. It's a refreshing change to have that lack of ego in music, but then again, a little ego never hurt anyone.

The other songs which came over well and had the crowd up and dancing (more than any other band) were "Happens All The Time,"

"Smother," and, from the new album Love Tara, "Stove". The band closed with a great sonic rendition of "Listen" with all of the members of the band struggling with their instruments and concluding with a great feedback-filled ending.

The most noticeable thing about E.T. on this night was that they were really tight, which just added to their sonic/melodic sound. Eric's Trip is truly a live band, with their music coming across much better in concert than on their recordings.

The long delay between Eric's Trip and TPOH was a bit frustrating, but when the band took the stage it was well worth it. The extended nineteen-song set consisted mostly of material from the latest release Downward Road, although earlier gems such as "New Language," "She's So Young" and "Two Girls In One" were not left out. The band members, led by a somewhat subdued Moe Berg, were in sync, but at the same time showed little emotion on stage (save for guitarist Kris Abbott). It was almost as if the wind and grind of touring North America has finally caught up to them. It simply looked like they were going through the motions.

E.T.: A worthwhile trip?

Michael Wiercinski

weird side to it, that was the whole idea behind it. In the same way the "love," although I use that term loosely, songs have that dark twisted view on them and the humour feel as well.

QJ: Even "I'm An Adult Now" is a song that's funny at first but with each listen it becomes more and more realistic.

MB: Like Homer Simpson says: "It's funny because it's true."

QJ: On the romance aspect, all the three albums deal with the darker side of this question. Is that meant to deconstruct the way that romance and love is idealized by society in general?

MB: There are plenty of people that idealize love and romance and write about that kind of thing. I

When the band showed bursts of its past emotion, such as on "Cigarette Dangles" and "Bored Of You," both the audience and the student constables responded in delight by dancing all over the place. The band also closed with a bang with its extended rendition of "I'm An Adult Now," the undisputed highlight of the show. In the middle of the song the band jumped into covers of "Supeman Song," "Achy Breaky Heart," "Back In Black," "Julie" (a birthday ode to Moe's obsession of the night), and a ringing comment on Doug Fleming and the Natural Law party's plan to use 7,000 yogie flyers to solve Canada's problems. It was this spontaneity that was missing from the rest of their set, and, judging from past performances, TPOH, while good tonight, can do better.

The low turn-out didn't prevent the show from being a success on the whole, as the bands all displayed good performances. Unfortunately, few people were there to see it. Maybe I just don't take baseball seriously enough.

with a film director or a film student. When we heard that Bruce McDonald was interested in doing it, we were lucky enough to have him. I really like his movies a lot.

QJ: Why did you decide not to work with Todd Rundgren (producer of New York Dolls fame) with this album, as opposed to Love Junk and One Sided Story?

MB: We just decided that we wanted to do something different. When you get together with the same people in the same environment all the time, you can't expect wildly different results each time out. As much as I liked working with Todd both times, I think we just wanted to put ourselves in a different situation, (in a different) creative environment, a new guy with a new way of dealing with things and a new city. It's just nice to have a change of pace.

QJ: As far as cracking the U.S. market goes, correct me if I'm wrong, but wasn't that one of the reasons that Chrysalis dropped The Pursuit Of Happiness?

MB: Both our record deals were American. So obviously that places a premium on how well you do in America. Our first record with Chrysalis did extremely well in Canada and relatively well in the U.S. "I'm An Adult Now" did pretty well on radio, we were played on MTV, received some high profile tours... so things went really well. With the second release, One Sided Story, the record company (was)... bought by EMI, and all the people were fired and new people were brought in. The problem was that the new people weren't the people that were there on the first record. Consequently, our relationship with the record company soured. At that point it became: what should we do? Should we stay here? Should we leave? We had a meeting with them and decided that we had nothing going there. So they didn't pick up our option.

QJ: How has Downward Road done in the U.S. now that TPOH is on Mercury?

MB: It hasn't done very well either. We went on Mercury and it's the same thing. If you get signed to an American (company), they don't care how well you do in Canada. They're not interested in it. Again, the record company has been largely absent in America. We'll have to see what happens on the next record. Despite this problem, we've always had good press in the U.S. Rolling Stone and People always review us and give us favourable ratings. However, this doesn't always translate into hard dollars, which is what the record company is looking for.

QJ: I know this has been something that you've been outspoken about in the past, but what's your feeling on Canadian content (Can-Con) requirements for radio?

MB: I have two minds on it. Ultimately, it's a drag that people are forced to play a certain music that they might not want to play. However, at the same time the unintended benefit of Can-Con is that in the States the radio plays Madonna, Hammer, Wilson Philips, whatever. In Canada it's the same thing, but with The Tragically Hip

Ardent Jays Ian Moe Berg does the wave.

Michael Wiercinski

or Spirit of the West thrown in. It makes for much better music.

QJ: I was surprised to find out that you played session guitar on Road Gore: The Band That Drank

Too Much by Jerry Jerry and the Sons of the Rhythm Orchestra.

MB: Jerry is an old friend of mine from the Edmonton days. I actually sang uncredited back-up vocals on the album as well.

QJ: How come TPOH hasn't appeared on any tribute albums, such as the ones done for Bruce Cockburn or Joni Mitchell?

MB: People have never really asked us to do that. There's rumoured to be a new Neil Young tribute record, and hopefully we'll get involved with that. [As for] the Joni Mitchell one, I would have really liked to have done that.

QJ: So how many dates do you have left on the tour?

MB: We're just winding down; in the beginning we were touring more aggressively. Actually, we started in Kingston on March 2 of this year and we continued to tour until a few weeks ago. We're doing this show and a week's worth of dates in Western Canada and then that's it... the Downward Road tour is finished.

QJ: Do you have plans to go back into the studio after the tour is done?

MB: Not right after. I haven't written very many songs, so consequently I have to go and do that, probably over the winter and then we'll try and figure how we'll make it into a record.

QJ: So when possibly can we expect a new record?

MB: It'll be a long time. We have no particular date set out as yet. We'll wait until we have [new] material again.

QJ: My mom thinks you look like a girl with long hair.

MB: Tell your mom I get that a lot.

Crossing the boundaries of identity

Gerald McMaster
Neya Nehiyaw: Crossfires of Identity
Agnes Etherington Art Centre
BY MIKE MOSS
The Queen's Journal

I despise italics when used to stress a point. For instance, an excerpt of Michael Bell's cover introduction to Cree artist, Gerald McMaster's four new exhibited works at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre: "... the dynamic process of relations formulated by Heidegger as A is A, a state of becoming." Not that I'm a little baffled as it is by Amerindian art (owing to a lack of cultural exposure), but now to have someone drop a tonne of German philosophy on my head so, as it were, to make things all the more clear... I just don't think so.

Granted McMaster is "concerned with identity," but what happened to the great break from theoretical verbiage? After I read this little slip of a handout, I thought to myself, "my identity = idiot." Having admired the artist's ironic wit in The United Colours of Barbie and the deft composition and passionate mystery of Crossfires of Identity, I suddenly realized that, try as I might, I couldn't adjust the dial of my consciousness to the essence of abstraction and the abstraction of essence." And I'm the art critic. Messing with people's aesthetic antennae is my job. So I went home in despair.

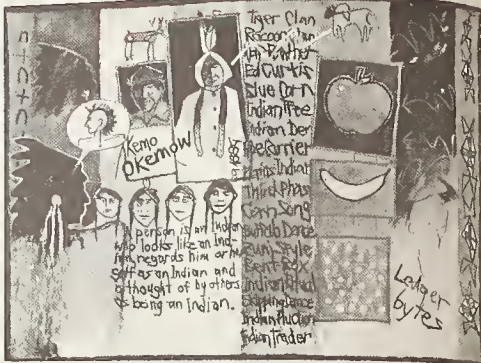

But I gathered up my nerve and returned the next day to ponder all that is Amerindian or non-white or colourful. A-wena kiyaw? (Who are you?) is so powerful because you can feel the artist showing you a world very much neglected from unity. Being shown something and having it revealed are two different phenomena.

McMaster's paintings strangely echo the art of Marc Chagall in that, aside from anecdotal images, the effect is such that the viewer is thrust outside of his world - as if showing the picture obscures one's habitual perception of reality.

As a whole, a-wena kiyaw is a fragmented series of words like "Indian," "Wounded Knee," "Art or Artifact" and pictorial symbols which seem judgement-free. McMaster's artistic roots (the priest and palette square) crowns a set of robotic white people who contrast strongly with colourful, open-mouthed Amerindians sitting around a circle.

It is strange, then, that the picture's dimensions are sharply angular when Amerindian culture is so circular (Western civilization is ruled by the square). But perhaps this is a metaphor for colonial intervention in Amerindian life struggling to box that culture into a set of a priori definitions.

By the repetition of Amerindian images familiar to the mainstream white population, Crossfires of Identity shows how artificial "Mr. Bull" and "Tonto" are as examples of a true Indian identity free of side-show attractions and sidekicks.

Crossfires of Identity is, as a result of two conspicuous fruits in the composition, also preoccupied with assimilation. As Bell writes, "[There are] Indians who have adopted the mainstream Western culture: apple red on the outside, white on the inside/ Asians who have adopted the mainstream Western culture: banana yellow on the outside, white on the inside." McMaster's art does emanate a weak current of hostility that is, notwithstanding degree, righteous, and there is a lot to get angry with in modern art. To appreciate the angst and depth of this exhibit you must be like the grape: have a thin skin and a soft heart.

Another Ten for Pearl Jam

Pearl Jam Vs.
Epic
BY ROB FURSE
The Queen's Journal

Two and half years ago when Pearl Jam exploded out of the Seattle scene they were indiscriminately and incorrectly labelled as a grunge band. Despite this journalistic pigeon-holing, it did not take long for fans to discover that Pearl Jam did not need to crank up the amps to play their style of music. Less abrasive than other Seattle bands such as Soundgarden, Alice in Chains or Nirvana, Pearl Jam were also palatable to the aristocracy of rock. While Kurt Cobain graced the cover of Rolling Stone with the words "Corporate Rock Still Sucks" emblazoned across his t-shirt, Eddie Vedder was jamming with the remaining three Doors at the 1992 Grammy awards, or touring with established acts such as U2 or Neil Young.

Predictably, Pearl Jam is now experiencing its share of backlash, being called such things as "sell-outs" or "the Journey of the nineties." As the acknowledged "voice" and focal point of the band, these criticisms have affected Vedder the most. Ironically, Vedder's poignant and personal lyrics often communicate more anger and destruction than any of the supposedly less mainstream grunge bands. Indeed it was Vedder, accepting an award for the video "Jeremy" at the 1993 MTV Video Awards, who said if it hadn't been for music, it would have been him who had blown his head off in front of the class.

Admittedly (much to the chagrin of alternative purists), the music of Pearl Jam is decidedly accessible; songs such as "Alive," "Even Flow" and "Black," which pushed the sales of Ten to five million, are all brilliant pop masterpieces. However, Pearl Jam never staked their credibility on having a heavily alternative sound; the band only professes to communicate their ideas in tandem with their best music. In other words, it would be difficult for Pearl Jam to sell-out when their original sound is already popular.

With all the hype and prejudice surrounding Pearl Jam, their new CD release Vs. stands to be subjected to intense scrutiny. While the record company will be looking for the next "Jeremy," critics will be searching for the recurrence of the genuine and touching themes of disenfranchisement and isolation which coloured Ten.

What Vs. offers is an extension of Ten, containing the same dark lyrical themes melded to Pearl Jam's stereotypical "grunge-pop" stylings that are, if anything, a step

Another maudlin sports flick, for you Rudy

If you thought The Program was bad...

Rudy
Directed by David Anspaugh
Cataract Cineplex
BY CHRISTOPHER ZABEL
The Queen's Journal

Doo doo doo whee whee (that's onomatopoeia for cheery music), ducks flap across a crisp Illinois morning. Wa wa wa wa, Rudy (Sean Astin) rolls around on the ground and then launches himself at a tackling dummy, evidently a key football skill. Do do do do do, pretty good sense at the time if you ask his buddy Pete. What's a kid to do?

Whoop whoop whoop: plenty of time to think the dilemma over in the next video sequence, augmented by the vocal stylings of the Notre Dame Glee Club: "Go Irish / Yeah hooray / We're so cool!"

Based on a true story, Rudy is set in a small Illinois community where everyone worships the Notre Dame football team, is generally everyone he meets, because geez, by gosh, and heck, this kid's got pluck.

This isn't a movie about sports, it's a movie about the American Dream and reaching for new heights (or blind stupidity - choose your poison). It seems that director David Anspaugh was trying to create the same magic that he worked in Hoosiers (I guess it was magical - it gets a lot of stars in my video guide). Unfortunately, this movie the oh-so Eisenstein-esque montage continues with a panoramic vista of the ever-so-awe-inspiring empty Notre Dame football stadium - "the field of dreams" for the Rude boy, who aspires to play for the legendary Fighting Irish. Whoom whoom whoom (damn I hate French horns), we see Rudy studying in the library, he's tired, but this cat's got moxie, chutzpah and sheer determination. Flamp hoop narp. Rudy in class, taking notes like a madman because he isn't all that bright but he has to get good grades; in spite of his dyslexia, in spite of all the people who said it couldn't be done (it's the classic underdog story), whine wheeze barf, (I can never get enough of these music video sequences: cut, cut, cut, perfectly designed for the short attention span of the TV-baby generation). PLEASE gimme more more more slo-mo football action sequences of the five-foot-nothing Rudy getting creamed and doing the Cool Hand Luke/Rocky Balboa get-up-anyway thing.

And then, suddenly, the harsh realistic grit of working class Catholic platitudes are served up as dialogue. We are treated to a tight shot of the six loose chins of Rudy's father (Ned Beatty): "There's nothing wrong with working a crappy job for the rest of your life kiddo, we'll drink some beers and watch some TV; pursuing hopeless dreams will only get you hurt." But then, on the other hand, "Having dreams is what makes life tolerable," which seems to make happy to go to church, gets drunk, and lives vicariously through the Notre Dame games on TV. Rudy, however, is a go-getter; he doesn't want to spend his life in a steel mill, he wants to be SOMEBODY. So one day, after his best friend explodes in an accident at work, Rudy leaves his fiancée and tries to get into Notre Dame. After quite a number of those oscillations between musical interludes and biting dialogue, he gets in. Then, after more of the same, he makes the football team and wins the hearts of doesn't even make it close to the rim. Anspaugh's first mistake was casting Sean Astin (the fat kid digging the pool in Encino Man) as his lead. This guy is just too much of a goon to be taken seriously. He spends the movie either in awe of those little "Fighting Irish" pseudo-leprechauns or else proffering pathetic soliloquies on the merits of football. Although Rudy does get onto the field in the last game of the season, there remains no dignity in brainwashing.

Most reminiscent of Ten, and perhaps the best track on the album, is "Rearviewmirror," a song driven by a Rush-like opening riff and a deceptively sing-along chorus. The song invites parallels to "Jeremy" through its subject matter of suicide and the loss of hope.

The CD begins with "Go," a high-paced number that seems to be spinning its wheels, until the chorus kicks in and pulls the whole song together. This is one of those songs that has to be heard a few times to be properly appreciated.

Set to Jeff Ament's loquaciously repetitive bass-line, one song that goes nowhere at all is "w.m.a." Here Vedder opens up the timely topic of white on black violence - a heavy theme to be sure, but the boring music is certainly not worthy of the six minutes of CD time it occupies.

Pearl Jam expands its sonic palette with the songs "animal" and "glorified g." The chorus of "animal" employs a staccato-like funk guitar, while "glorified g" utilizes some new harmony patterns and more syncopated guitar work.

Needless to say, the quality of playing on Vs. is first-rate, with Mike McCready and Stone Gossard utilizing their guitars to alternatively issue piercingly melodic solos or back up the howls of Eddie Vedder.

Vs., like Ten, is a great CD. And undoubtedly there is enough radio-friendly material to guarantee it healthy sales. Pearl Jam has taken a sure step in their consecration as one of rock's leading and most popular performers. What remains to be seen is if Eddie Vedder and Pearl Jam can overcome the forces against them and continue to produce inspiring music.

Acclaimed Pianist at Grant

The Queen's Journal Staff

Internationally-renowned Canadian pianist Louis Lortie returns to Kingston this Thursday evening for a special free performance in honour of the hundredth-anniversary of The Queen's Quarterly.

Born in Quebec, Lortie made his debut with the Orchestre Symphonique de Montreal at the age of thirteen. Only three years later he took the top prize in both of Canada's two major competitions, the Canadian Music Competition and the CBC National. In 1984, Lortie was unanimously awarded First Prize at the Busoni International Competition, launching an international career which has distinguished him as one of the outstanding pianists of his generation.

Though now based in London, Lortie is a regular guest of some of North America's finest orchestras, including Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland, San Francisco, and, of course, Toronto and Montreal.

For his return to Kingston, Lortie offers a typically challenging programme showcasing his virtuosity. The evening at Grant Hall will open with Schubert's Sonata in G Major, Op. 78, D. 894, followed by Chopin's The Twenty-Four Preludes, Op. 28. A selection of Maurice Ravel's recordings for the Chandos and Decca-London labels.

Tickets for this special performance are nearly sold out, so don't delay in going to the Performing Arts Office in the upper level of the JDUC to pick up yours.

Louis Lortie performs at Grant Hall, Thursday at 8 p.m.

Ever taken a ride on a 23-foot-long wiener?

We did...and we took pictures!

If you were out enjoying the fine Homecoming weather last Friday, you might have run into the Oscar Mayer Wienermobile, pictured in the photos above. BackPage/MISC editor Joey deVila (top) and several friends from the other paper terrorized the local citizenry during their hour-long cruise. The Wienermobile is a converted '88 Chevy van with a V-6 engine. It is currently being operated by the "Wiener Women", Chris and Lynda, two interns at Oscar Mayer. They are currently driving the Wienermobile across Canada and the U.S., handing out promotional gifts and singing the praises of their company's cylindrical meat products. We'll present an interview with Chris in an upcoming MISC. Hot diggety dog!

WAIT - Read This Too!

Ack, heck, ptoey! Bitter is the taste of foot in mouth, especially when dealing with issues as important as safe sex. Last week's Back Page article, "Getting didactic about prophylactics" (Back Page, October 19), contained a few errors and oversights that we'd like to rectify. Thanks to Martha Bernard from the Birth Control Centre (BCC) and Bill Holder from the Kingston AIDS Project (KAP) for spotting and correcting our gaffes.

The article states that The Grey House (including OPIRG, CUSEN and Queen's Christian Fellowship) was made "non-opt-outable" last year. That's mistake number one. The organization known as Queen's Student and Community Services Group (QSCSG) was made non-opt-outable for undergraduates as a result of a referendum held last year. QSCSG's member groups are the Women's Centre, The Lesbian and Gay Association, Telephone Area Line Kingston (TALK) and the Birth Control Centre. The Grey House (St. Queen's Crescent) is the building in which QSCSG is based; it is not the QSCSG. For any of you taking the CRE this year, think of it this way: QSCSG is to the Grey House in the same way that the Blue Jays are to the SkyDome. Capesh?

We would like to emphasize that the condom's 98% effectiveness rate in preventing pregnancy is true only for people who use condoms properly every time they have sex. Similarly, condoms must always be used properly to help prevent the transmission of STDs. We know that a lot of people treat condom instructions in the same manner they do safety instructions on airplanes: they ignore them and hope for a trip without incident. Since you can never get too much education, we present the Birth Control Centre/Kingston AIDS Project instructions for the operation of your condom.

- Steps to proper use of a condom:
1. Check colour, expiry date of the condom before unwrapping it.
 2. Check condom package for an air pocket — if there is no air pocket, don't use it — the condom may be punctured.
 3. Push condom to one end of package and rip end of package with your fingers (not your teeth!).
 4. Check to see which way the condom unrolls — if the condom is put upside down on the head of the penis before checking and it has to be turned over to unroll, don't use it — there could now be pre-ejaculatory semen on the outside of the condom.
 5. Pinch top of condom so that semen has somewhere to go.
 6. Roll condom down to base of penis.
 7. Withdraw immediately after ejaculation.
 8. Remove condom, tie a knot at the open end of the used condom and discard responsibly — in the toilet, please!
 9. Never use an oil-based lubricant (eg. vaseline) with condoms — it will weaken the latex.

Because it is sometimes difficult to follow these steps every time you use a condom, BCC recommends using condoms and spermicides together if you want to prevent pregnancy. Used together properly, condoms used with foam or jelly are 92-98% effective in preventing pregnancy.

The article in question stated that if a condom breaks, "you should either insert some spermicide into the vagina immediately or use the "morning after pill." Plenty of lubrication, either natural or water-based store bought (eg. K-Y Jelly), greatly decreases the chance of condom breakage. Even with these precautions, condoms still sometimes break. That's why it is important to use jelly or foam with condoms if you are concerned about pregnancy. Apply the jelly or foam before having sex, not after. It is also important to note that the "morning after pill" (MAP) is not a contraceptive and should not be used on a regular basis, eg. once a month. That takes care of mistake number two.

The last step in extricating our word processors from our mouths covers the advice offered to gay men and lesbians. First, we left out bisexual men and women from our discussion. Given the number of bisexual people who have died with AIDS or are currently living with HIV or AIDS, their exclusion from the AIDS discussion of the article is unfair. We apologize to any who were slighted by this oversight; you were included in spirit if not in letter. Second, we know that everyone — not just lesbian, gay and bisexual people — can acquire HIV. We did refer to sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) in our article, but only specifically mentioned HIV (which is an STD) in the advice to gay men, lesbians and (in spirit) bisexuals. Once again, apologies. Third, KAP does not consider oral sex on men to be a high risk sexual activity nor does it always require the use of a condom. Furthermore, anal sex with a latex condom is considered low risk, and can be even safer with proper condom use and the use of a water-based lubricant. KAP does not give the "either double bag or order reinforced condoms" option, which our article suggested. Safer sex is fun and the precautions which should be taken are simple; there is no need to complicate safer sex with overwhelming instructions such as the "double bag or reinforce" rule. Our errors came from information in the Montreal Health Press booklet on safe sex, whose advice conflicts with that of KAP in these areas. We defer to KAP, who can stay current while a booklet cannot. If any of you are double-bagged as a result of reading the article, we apologize for your "wasting" your condom (and to think we get upset when someone knocks over our beer).

Martha Bernard is the Co-Director of the Birth Control Centre. Bill Holder is a Volunteer Education Speaker for the Kingston AIDS project. This article can't provide all the information or answers, if you have any questions at all, you can call the Birth Control Centre at 545-2959 or the Kingston AIDS project at 545-3989.

Derek Walker, the author of the original article, used Saran Wrap until Martha and Bill told him not to. Joey deVila once made a prank call on Q107's "Sex Show" hosted by Sue Johansen, who gave him improper instructions for wearing condoms during her last visit to Queen's.

Turmoil in AMS

Commissioners criticize executive

BY JEFF GRAY and LORI THORLAKSON

Sparks flew at last night's Alma Mater Society Assembly, as three AMS commissioners launched scathing attacks aimed primarily at the AMS executive.

The commissioners read statements to Assembly accusing the executive of being unsupportive and unresponsive, of exhibiting inappropriate behaviour, and of working at cross purposes with their commissions.

Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell, Academic Affairs Commissioner Taz Pirmohamed and Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin, all visibly upset, addressed Assembly while the executive slid back into their seats.

Mitchell raised concerns about the conduct of the executive and accused members of the executive of undermining her commission's efforts to promote a safe and responsible Alumni Weekend.

She explained that the purpose of events held by the AMS over the weekend was to offer an alternative to disruptive street and house parties.

"So how are we supposed to feel when on Friday night, one of the members of the exec has a sauna house party, a party that [Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations)] Dr. Williams, Queen's Housing, Security and the Police all felt it was necessary to shut down?" Mitchell asked.

Mitchell further chastised the executive for offering little or no help with Alumni Weekend, and said not one of the executive attended any AMS-sponsored events over homecoming.

Mitchell said she was distressed with the executive's attitude, referring to AMS Vice-President (Operations) Tim Wilson's response to commissioner's concern that "he did not want to address."

She said Wilson responded with "If we don't privatize, we're never going to be world class," said Wong in an interview with The Journal on Thursday.

Before it comes into effect, the proposal must be approved by the faculty of the School of Business, the university Senate, and the Board of Trustees.

On the question of accessibility, Wong said part of the proposal includes working out an agreement with a financial institution to allow for an income-contingent loan repayment plan for students needing help to cover the $20,000 tuition

Incoming mayor under fire

Disabled Women's Network calls for Matthews' resignation

BY LORI THORLAKSON

Members of the Queen's and Kingston community confronted mayor designate Ken Matthews at City Hall Wednesday, and demanded his resignation.

The demands came in response to remarks allegedly made by Matthews, which mocked the legal action pursued by a disabled woman who had been sexually assaulted.

After a heated special meeting, city council voted to accept an apology from Matthews for the comments, which he maintains he never made. The vote was 8-7, with Matthews casting the deciding vote.

Matthews will replace Helen Cooper as Mayor of Kingston next Monday.

An Oct. 20 Whig-Standard article reported that Matthews called a peace bond hearing a "kangaroo court."

In the hearing, Justice of the Peace Cathy Hickling ordered a peace bond against the driver of a handibus, after a disabled female passenger complained that the driver had fondled her breasts.

The peace bond — a directive, not a court-ruling — based on the woman's fear, was issued even though the driver has not been convicted of an offense in court.

Matthews denied making the comments. In a news release circulated to council members and the Whig-Standard, Matthews said, "the statement attributed to me was inaccurate and I would like to indicate to all parties involved that it was never my intention to embarrass or insult any individual or organization."

"If I offended any individual or group by what appeared in the Kingston Whig-Standard, I sincerely apologize," he said.

Profs ponder Liberal landslide, Tory demise Foresee tough tasks ahead for Chretien government

BY GEOFF LANGDON
The Queen's Journal

Many Canadians went to the polls on Monday seeking to change the face of Canadian Parliament. And after the votes were tallied, Canada came away with a very different-looking House of Commons.

The Liberals cruised to a healthy majority, while the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party made strong, if regional, showings.

Perhaps the most surprising story of the night was the governing Progressive Conservative Party, who were wiped out, holding on to only two seats. The New Democratic Party also fell below the 12-seat minimum for official party status.

According to Dr. Tom Courchene, director of the School of Policy Studies, the fall of the Tories can be attributed to a "relatively foolish campaign."

Courchene believes the fundamental approach of the Conservative campaign was wrong. "They weren't able to separate the old Tories from the new Tories," he said. "They felt they could run on the popularity of Kim Campbell."

Since they failed to show a new approach to government, and appeared to follow the old rules, their plan backfired, Courchene said. He also cited the Tories' lack of a solid platform, and political gaffes - such as the disastrous ad campaign - as reasons for their fall.

When asked about their future, Courchene saw little that the Tories could do with only two seats. He predicted a shift in emphasis from federal to provincial politics, with many unsuccessful Tory candidates being asked to run provincially.

Dr. Janet Hiebert, a professor in the School of Political Studies, said the voters were simply frustrated with nine years of Conservative government.

"I don't believe the problems were related to Kim Campbell herself," Hiebert said. "Jean Charest wouldn't have been any more successful."

Hiebert said Campbell will have a hard time remaining leader of the Conservatives. "It would be difficult for her to be leader without a seat," she said.

The Conservatives themselves will have a hard time rebuilding, she added. By losing their official party status, they lose the staff, the research budget and the other perks that come from such status, she said.

Both Hiebert and Courchene identified the promises the Liberals made during the campaign as key goals for the coming months.

"They're going to have to be concerned about the deficit," said Courchene.

Hiebert foresaw important tasks ahead for the Liberal government. These include Jean Chretien's infrastructure program and reacting to several controversial Tory policies, such as the North American Free Trade Agreement, the helicopter program and the Toronto airport deal.

Will the rise of the Bloc Quebecois affect the Liberals' ability to put their policies into effect?

Not according to Courchene. The official opposition chairs many parliamentary committees and will have "fairly substantial influence on them, but not much impact on policy," Courchene said. This, Courchene believes, would be a source of frustration within the Bloc Quebecois.

Courchene also said he didn't believe the Bloc was elected with a mandate to pursue sovereignty.

"The mandate to pursue separation comes from the provincial side," he said. Any attempt to push the issue federally would be "an exercise in futility."

Hiebert voiced similar views, saying the real purpose of the Bloc will be to focus parliamentary discussion on Quebec issues.

"It would be difficult to interpret their victory as a mandate for separation," she said. "Any attempt to do so would be dishonest."

The surge in Reform popularity, mainly in the western provinces, was due, according to Hiebert, to "traditional western alienation."

"Their role in Ottawa will be to hold the Liberal government accountable," Hiebert said.

Some fast facts about the 1993 federal election:

Voter turnout this year was 71 per cent. This compares with 76 per cent in 1988, and 75 per cent in the 1984 vote. This year's figure is closer to 1980's, when 69 per cent of eligible voters cast ballots.

The new Parliament will have a record number of female MP's. This year, 53 women were elected to the House. 36 of these MP's are Liberals, 8 are Bloc Quebecois, and 7 are Reformers. The Conservatives and New Democrats each elected one MP this year. In 1988, there were 39 women elected to Parliament.

Some prominent MP's were defeated in this year's election. Besides Prime Minister Kim Campbell, External Affairs Minister Perrin Beatty, Public Security Minister Doug Lewis, Revenue Minister Garth Turner, and Supply and Services Minister Paul Dick were among the many well-known Conservatives who lost. The New Democrats' Steven Langdon, Howard McCurdy, and Dave Barrett, all familiar faces to political junkies, also lost their seats.

Post mortem on the Tories

BY JONATHAN LEIGH
The Queen's Journal

In the aftermath of the Conservative Party's defeat, which has been called the most devastating in Canadian political history, students and faculty gathered in the Policy Studies Building to hear two respected political commentators give their post mortem.

Brian Mulroney's former Chief of Staff, Hugh Segal, who is now a fellow at Queen's Policy Studies, and University of Montreal Professor Andre Blais, offered their insights on a federal campaign that saw a complete overhaul of the Canadian political landscape.

Both the NDP and the Conservatives lost their official party status in the House of Commons, by winning fewer than twelve seats. The Liberal Party achieved a national victory, and is now facing two regionally-based parties in opposition.

The focus of both the speakers and the audience was the stunning collapse of the PC party and the reasons behind it. Professor Blais illustrated this with a graph of polls taken throughout the campaign. Using this information, he pinpointed the two turning points in the campaign.

The first, he said, occurred when Prime Minister Kim Campbell stated that an election campaign was not the time to discuss social programs. The second downfall came on the heels of a Conservative television ad which mocked Liberal leader Jean Chretien's facial paralysis.

These slips were matched by corresponding jumps in Liberal popular support, Blais showed.

Meanwhile, right up until election day, both the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois saw their popularity rise steadily, as each garnered over fifty seats. The NDP hovered at a constant level of seven to eight per cent throughout the campaign.

As for the support of Quebec

sovereignty, Blais said that only 76 per cent of those who voted for the Bloc were in favour of it. Over half of Quebec voters supported the Bloc Quebecois.

In other results, Blais noted that support for sovereignty decreased when voters were told that sovereignty would mean Quebec's exit from the Canadian federation.

Hugh Segal described a failure on the part of Kim Campbell to build a "coalition" of voters, as one of many reasons for the Conservatives' demise.

"Coalitions aren't inherited," he said, "they're built."

He spoke of past coalitions built by Conservative leaders, who appealed to a number of income, life-style, and education segments of the population to gain power.

These included the "anti-Liberal" coalition of 1984 and what he described as a "prosperity coalition," which emerged victorious in 1988.

"The problem with the prosperity coalition," Segal said, "is that you kind of need prosperity to hold it together."

As for the future of Canadian politics, he said it would be a very interesting time. He noted that a great majority of those elected will be new to parliament.

He saw a particular challenge facing the Reform Party. "Their first challenge is to get through the maiden speeches of their new Members of Parliament. I think it will be one of the more interesting events in the House of Commons."

While he noted that the Conservatives face an uphill battle in rebuilding their party, Segal cited the health of several provincial wings of the party, especially in Ontario, which he said could seize power within the next few years.

Segal did not see a great number of problems coming from the Bloc Quebecois, which he said stands to lose power if the party disrupts to parliament.

He said the Liberals, through little fault of their own, will have problems implementing some of their promises dealing with Canadian social programs and job creation. He indicated that the success of Chretien's $6 billion jobs program will depend on the improvement of the economy and the cooperation of provincial and municipal governments.

AMS reacts to vote

BY GEOFF LANGDON
The Queen's Journal

The Alma Mater Society's Academic Affairs Commissioner characterized the election of a Liberal majority as "the best thing to happen to universities."

Speaking to The Journal, Taz Pirmohamed voiced her support for the new government. "We were lucky to get a majority government," she said.

"We have a receptive Member of Parliament who is aware of a lot of educational issues," Pirmohamed said, referring to Peter Milliken, the local Liberal who was easily re-elected Monday night. Milliken captured about 57 per cent of the vote in Kingston and the Islands.

"Peter seems to be receptive to what we're saying," she said.

Pirmohamed explained that all the parties were surveyed on their views towards education, as part of the Vote Education campaign.

The campaign was a national effort run by 21 colleges and universities across Canada.

While she had kind words for the Liberals, Pirmohamed criticized other parties. "The Reform Party, from the survey results, has little or no policy on education. The [Bloc Quebecois] as well - they're both special interest parties," she said.

Laurier president visits Queen's

Former senator considers universities, election results

BY TARA ROY
The Queen's Journal

Last Tuesday night, Dr. Lorna Marsden, president and vice-chancellor at Sir Wilfrid Laurier University, spoke to a small group of people in the Ban Righ Fireside Room, in a speech entitled, "Women as Leaders".

Although her talk touched upon many subjects, the two prevailing topics were politics and universities.

The first in a series of speakers on women as leaders, hosted by the dean of women, Marsden has published many books about social change in Canada, and in particular, the plight of women. She is a former Canadian senator and one-time president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

Marsden praised universities for their openness and their accountability. "They are the most accountable institutions I've ever run into," she said. When people ask her why she left the senate to accept a position in a university, Marsden said, she tells them universities "need defense, advancement and encouragement in Canada."

In almost nine years in Parliament, she found that universities are never mentioned directly. "They are only mentioned indirectly, like through copyright law, and if someone brings them up, you get some MP saying, 'that's the place that gave my kid a hard time,' and the subject is dropped," she said.

Responding to a concern that universities have traditionally been patriarchal institutions, Marsden responded, "we have to be able to conceptualize a university that's not patriarchal or matriarchal, but something else entirely."

She characterized universities as individualistic

"I'm sure [Kim Campbell] will end up taking the blame for most of what happened, whether or not she deserves it."

places, saying, "professors are basically their own people — no one can tell them what to do. You've got to know where the bodies are buried to get along."

She explained that the attitude on campuses is that "students graduate. Professors are always there — they never go away."

This outlook, said Marsden, leads people to wonder what difference one person can make. To explain the effect an individual can have, she cited Preston Manning and Lucien Bouchard as examples.

"Although I don't agree with either of them, they took tremendous advantage of opportunity," she said. Taking advantage of opportunity is what makes a difference, and also what helps to make one successful, according to Marsden.

Dr. Lorna Marsden, speaking on women's issues.

Marsden began talking about the recent federal election by saying that she knew all of the leaders. "Well ... that's not true. I don't know Preston Manning," she quipped.

One of the key factors in the election, Marsden said, was the leaders' policies and their presentation. She said Campbell's problem was that she didn't clarify her ideas. "You have to know what you're doing and why you're doing it," she remarked.

Marsden brought up three aspects to look at when considering a leader. She mentioned the necessity of having an analysis of policy. Further, the personality of the leader must be looked at, and finally, an evaluation of the institutions and structures within the particular party should be made by the electorate.

Marsden said that voters may have failed to consider this last criterion. She said NDP leader Audrey McLaughlin completely transformed her party from within, but voters simply were not aware of this.

Marsden also raised the question of how much difference gender made in regards to the party leaders. She cited Kim Campbell's "devastation," adding, "I sure she'll end up taking the blame for most of what happened, whether or not she deserves it."

Listing some of the challenges that face women in today's society, Marsden said women's complaints are not listened to, and some people have trouble accepting women leaders. In addition, she said, women feel they must continuously prove themselves.

"I never met a woman who thought that she had 'made it,'" said Marsden.

With regards to women's issues, Marsden said, "It's moving in the right direction — just very slowly."

Marsden concluded her talk on a positive note. She said most people are aware of female leaders in society, and argued women do have some degree of representation in Parliament.

There are women in every party, she said, so "we can stop diffusing energy between women and men, but between women and themselves and their ideas."

Visiting Prof talks women and politics in China

Discusses difficulties for women in Chinese society

BY LAURIE NORTH
The Queen's Journal

On Wednesday afternoon, the department of politics hosted guest lecturer Wu Qing, an American politics and women's studies professor at the Beijing Foreign Studies University.

In her lecture, "Women and Politics in Beijing," Qing discussed the gradual changes of women's issues. By striving for gender equality, Qing hopes that women will be raised up "to a level that is equal with men," and share the same social and economic benefits.

Qing emphasized the importance of ying-yang within all spheres of life, with "women and men working together." By achieving this balance, Qing believes, a "healthy body, healthy family, and healthy world" will result.

In 1985, Qing co-organized one of China's first non-governmental organizations, which consisted of nine women foreigners of the Beijing University. Together the women discussed pertinent women's issues, and "moved beyond individual experience into society to make change happen."

As a result of the 1984 urban reform movement, Qing explained, women were the "first to be fired and the last to be hired." By losing their jobs and having to work in the home, she said, women experienced a diminished sense of identity.

Qing noted some of the difficulties women encounter in China's industrialized society. As part of the government's family planning, women must promise to have one child, Qing explained, although she may have two children if the first child is a girl.

It is illegal for women to have an ultrasound to determine the sex of the child, and some women have been "forced to have abortions," she said.

Women are often not hired by factories and institutions due to the extra expenses of maternity leave or day-care centres. This is also due to a shortage of workers. However, Qing said that now husbands are required to pay half of these expenses.

To financially assist women, child-raising funding centres have also been set up. When a woman enters the workforce, she pays one per cent of her earnings into this fund.

One program Qing helped establish is China's first counselling hotline. Trained counsellors provide advice and support for women experiencing marital, divorce, sexual harassment, family-planning, child-care or legal problems.

Qing is optimistic about current changes in the political and social conditions in China. "Things are changing and opening up, but it is still not enough, we must become more vocal to have our voices heard and bring about change," Qing said.

With sensitivity in her voice, Qing emphasized that China must look after its people. As a developing country affected by long periods of drought, Qing noted China has a serious and widespread problem of hunger, which afflicts many rural Chinese peasants.

Qing noted that women are still not "expected to be aggressive, assertive or independent," qualities which Qing proudly admits she possesses. However, she noted that she has been considered a controversial figure for standing up for her beliefs.

Qing will be speaking on the impact of reform on women in China during the Asian Conference. The conference will take place Oct. 29-31 in the Policy Studies Building.

New GSS President elected

Grad students choose replacement

BY JANE MUNDELL
The Queen's Journal

While all eyes were focussed on the Oct. 25 federal elections, five days earlier, the Graduate Student Society ratified Scott Duggan as their new president.

Duggan, the former vice-president (internal) of the GSS and a second-year Master's in Pharmacology student, was acclaimed to the presidency earlier this month and has been acting president of the GSS since the resignation of Michael Aregbesola in September.

In an interview with the Queen's Journal, Duggan said that there are many key issues facing graduate students at this time.

"One area of concern," Duggan said, "is the proposed increase in tuition fees."

He made reference to the Council of Ontario Universities discussion paper on tuition reform, which

"put forth a number of proposals arguing that tuition fees for professional schools be increased by a factor of 1.5, or 50 per cent."

The COU "argues that the tuition reform will not affect the accessibility of graduate schools for students," Duggan said, but he disagrees.

"It could have serious consequences," he stated. Duggan said that two other members of the GSS executive are now attending conventions in Vancouver, hosted by the Canadian Association of Graduate Schools and by the Canadian Graduate Council, where they hope to gather more information about the proposed tuition reform.

The GSS will then be organizing a campaign at Queen's to fight the COU proposals, Duggan said, and is also planning to "get organized with graduate students from other universities."

He expressed "concern that not many people realize the contributions that graduate students make to the university," citing their active work in research and their many teaching responsibilities.

Duggan also said that he hopes to "promote an awareness of the GSS on campus." He listed some of the benefits of being a member, such as the opt-outable drug plan which is separate from that of undergraduate students, and includes a drug coverage of 100 per cent.

The GSS is planning a number of social events this year as well, Duggan said.

Another of Duggan's ambitions is to "be able to represent graduate students effectively at various university ceremonies." As GSS president, he is a member of the Senate and sits on some of its committees.

Duggan said elections will be held soon to elect a new GSS vice-president (internal).

Mastering the fine art of conversation

International Centre gives students a hand

BY DENNIS PAO
The Queen's Journal

Most students at Queen's take their English skills for granted, but for some, this isn't the case.

With an eye to these students, the International Centre in the John Deutsch University Centre runs the Language Support Program for students who have difficulty with conversational English.

The program is designed mainly to help students with conversational skills and not with technicalities.

"We do not teach English," said Susan Anderson, the director of the program.

"It is a program for new Canadians and some international students who may have a good grasp of grammar, but for whom carrying on a conversation or conducting a seminar may be more difficult," she said.

Anderson emphasized that the program is informal and totally non-academic. "We are not an English as a Second Language program," she said. "We are simply offering a service for students who are just acquiring English as a first language."

Students who feel they need this service can drop in at the International Centre.

"I ask them to be as specific as they can be about their needs," said Anderson. "Then, they are matched to the tutors according to skills offered and assistance needed."

Tutors for the program are student volunteers who do not have to have any teaching skills.

"No one is expected to be an English teacher. We just need volunteers who will help with conversation and pronunciation skills," said Anderson. "The average commitment is only about one hour a week."

The tutors also meet in sessions to "share ideas with one another," said Anderson.

Anyone who is interested in taking advantage of this program or becoming a tutor should contact Susan Anderson in the International Centre.

No dirty dishes in this Kitchen Sink

Young entrepreneurs capitalize on store

BY KATHY GOLDER
The Queen's Journal

Have you looked in The Kitchen Sink lately? It's a student-run store in the John Deutsch University Centre that gives student entrepreneurs a place to hawk their wares.

Located next to the Toronto Dominion bank machines, the store stocks clothing such as vests, T-shirts, sweaters and hats, as well as jewellery, artwork, and posters. Most of its merchandise is provided by students.

The store gets its name, said Assistant Manager Debbie Boccongelles, from the saying "everything but..."

Boccongelles and Manager Luke O'Regan, both students, were hired by the Alma Mater Society last year when the service first got off the ground.

The Kitchen Sink is "run by students for students," said Boccongelles, and there are "no royalties [paid] to the AMS" on sales.

According to Boccongelles, the location of The Kitchen Sink makes it very accessible to students and offers a "unique opportunity for students to buy other students' merchandise."

The managers of The Kitchen Sink believe there are a lot of student entrepreneurs at Queen's, and they encourage them to come out and sell their goods at the store.

"It's really inexpensive and a great opportunity for any student with a creative streak," Boccongelles noted.

It costs approximately $50 per day to lease the whole store, less to lease only part of the space. Leases generally last one week but successful entrepreneurs often lease for longer.

Boccongelles said it would only cost a couple of dollars per day to book a table in the store. Selling one pair of earrings, for example, would cover the cost of the table for the day and the rest of the profits would go straight to the entrepreneur, she said.

The week-long leases mean there is a high turn-over. "Every week there's something different," Boccongelles said.

Queen's student Hegge Pederson sold her vests in The Kitchen Sink for three weeks. She said she was very happy with the arrangement, her vests sold well, and it was very easy and convenient to organize.

The Kitchen Sink is always looking for entrepreneurs with a wide variety of talents. Boccongelles suggests that a service board, where students could advertise their services to other students, would be a welcome addition.

Boccongelles and O'Regan also welcome a variety of entrepreneurs, and not just people who make something - marketable are also wanted.

Each entrepreneur provides a store with a cash float and a comprehensive price list. This was Wednesday [Oct. 20] until Tuesday [Oct. 26] autonomous.

Space for holiday gift-shopping season is filling up, Boccongelles said. Although primarily meant for student entrepreneurs, downtown merchants can also rent space, but they must pay more rent, and they only ever occupy a total of 30 per cent of the store.

The Kitchen Sink's hours are 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday to Friday. The store is operated on a cost basis and depending on the space booked, entrepreneurs are asked to spend some time working in the store. Students who are interested in selling their products in the store can pick up an application outside the AMS or in the

Edward Said to speak

BY IAN PETRIE
The Queen's Journal

Renowned literary critic and political activist Edward Said will visit Kingston next Wednesday to give the Dunning Trust Lecture, entitled "Historical Experience and Multiculturalism."

Said has taught comparative literature and the humanities at Columbia University in New York City since 1963, where he is presently University Professor.

Although Said initially became known as a Conrad specialist (authoring Joseph Conrad and the Fiction of Autobiography), his influence expanded greatly in 1978 with the publication of Orientalism, his enormously influential (and still controversial) critique of traditional Western views of the East.

Like Noam Chomsky, Said is as well-known for his political views as for his strictly academic work. For many years, he has been an insistent voice for the rights of Palestinians, and between 1977 and 1991 he was a member of the Palestine National Council (the parliament-in-exile of Palestinians).

He has written extensively on this topic, in such works as The Question of Palestine and, with Christopher Hitchens, Blaming the Victims: Spurious Scholarship and the Palestinian Question.

Said's latest book, Culture and Imperialism (published last winter), is an ambitious attempt to link traditional aesthetic culture (such as Austen's Mansfield Park and Verdi's Aida) and imperial power (like Britain and France in the past, and the U.S. now).

While Said's lecture next week will undoubtedly reflect the concerns of his current work, the timing of the visit ensures that the Palestinian-Israeli accord (which Said opposes) will be the object of intense questioning.

Said will speak at Dunning Auditorium, at 8 p.m. next Wednesday.

Mayor designate asked to resign

Laura McKay, a fourth-year politics student at Queen's, criticized Matthews' alleged comments, calling them "misogynistic in content" and "not appropriate behaviour for a mayor-designate."

Councillor Jim Neill, who earlier criticized Matthews' alleged remarks in a letter to the Whig-Standard, was concerned that the comments attributed to Matthews could amount to interference in the judicial system.

"People in this community who feel intimidated or fearful should be able to get a peace bond without a bureaucrat or politician phoning the Whig-Standard to complain," Neill said.

Several groups from the community were at the meeting seeking an apology from Matthews and a clarification of council's position on the matter.

Ruth Warner, a counsellor at the Sexual Assault Crisis Centre, addressed her concerns to council. "We work long and hard in the community to create an environment supportive to women. I believe very firmly that the alleged comments have undermined this to a certain extent."

"Despite the news release, many of us are concerned that this won't be the last time we hear this kind of comment from the mayor designate," Warner said. She asked council for "assurance that if the mayor designate doesn't tender his resignation that we won't have to deal with that again."

Kirsten Spring, chair of the Disabled Women's Network Ontario, questioned Matthews' claims. "Why did it take from Wednesday [Oct. 20] until Tuesday [Oct. 26] to get an apology?" she asked.

In addition to an apology, the motion contained recognition that the "kangaroo court" comment "caused concern in the community both among the judiciary and with parties to the court proceedings referred to."

Neill criticized the motion, calling it a "reserved apology" that "doesn't nearly go far enough."

Neill said the apology consists of "three phrases that lambaste the Whig-Standard for inaccurate reporting, two that lambaste me for incivility... and one that laments the fact that persons who were offended by the alleged remarks didn't phone or contact him [Matthews]."

"I don't know what planet Councillor Matthews has been on for the last week but women in the community have been offended. The press release should not have read 'if I offended', it should have read 'I'm sorry I offended'." Neill said.

Neill said "[Matthews] should tender his resignation if the remarks are accurate... I believe The Whig is a credible newspaper."

Whig-Standard News Editor Doug Ronson said that they are standing by their story. "We are satisfied that we quoted him accurately," he said.

Matthews refused to comment on the time lapse between the appearance of the "kangaroo court" comment in the Whig-Standard and his apology seven days later. Instead, he said that he will speak to women at Queen's.

An open forum, including Matthews, the disabled woman, and some councillors, will take place Thursday. The meeting will occur in the Lower Celliuh of the John Deutsch University Centre, Nov. 4 at 5:15 p.m. All people are welcome to attend.

AMS Assembly

criticized the bureaucratization of the AMS, the waste of resources and the lack of executive leadership.

"I am concerned that the AMS is no longer an organization for students, and hasn't been for a number of years," Nevin said.

Addressing the allegations, AMS President Katherine Phillips said "I think it is fair that these concerns were brought to Assembly."

Phillips explained that "these problems have occurred every year," and said she hoped plans currently underway to overhaul AMS structures would remedy the problem.

Todd Minerson, AMS vice-president (university affairs), thanked the commission-ers for voicing their concerns, adding that some of the concerns were "very legitimate."

Minerson echoed Phillip's hopes that the re-engineering process would solve the structural problems.

Pirmohamed disagreed, tracing the root of the problem not to a "function of structure, but a lack of responsibility that the executive has demonstrated."

The executive left Assembly with promises of concrete action. On the advice of Main Campus Residents' Council President Warren Flannery, both Phillips and the commissioners agreed to enlist the help of a mediator to resolve the conflict.

Kingston's Only Authentic Greek Cuisine

International Wines by glass or bottle
Lunch from $5.50, Dinner from $7.95

Kingston's newest Greek restaurant opened its doors one month ago to offer customers a total dining experience with a taste of Greece. Exposed brick, stucco white wash walls, earthy forest green tones, photos of Greece and Greek music all add to the ambience of Grecos. The owners cook up a large selection of fine Mediterranean cuisine from their native Greece. Start with a platter of appetizer selections - they made us a special platter of delicious bites of each. We had chicken broccettes and broiled salmon steak for dinner. Both were beautifully presented and very tasty. You must try their house specialty "saganaki" - pan fried cheese that is flambéed at your table and melts in your mouth. End your meal with a decadent piece of homemade authentic baklava - it's nutty, rich and dripping in honey. Perfectly cooked food, excellent service and a friendly atmosphere are featured at Grecos, 167 Princess St. Open seven days a week.

Canada's new political landscape

Monday night left Canadians reeling — and political pundits gleeful. Voters painted the country, or at the very least, Ontario, Liberal red. For the first time, the Progressive Conservatives achieved gender parity in Parliament — with only two seats, neither of which are held by the party's leader and ex-Prime Minister, Kim Campbell.

The New Democratic Party got more than four times the number of seats than the Conservatives. And the Reform Party — whoever would have guessed the enormity of their popularity would translate into the embarrassing decimation of the Conservative Party?

The Campaign:

The Reform Party was not singlehandedly responsible for the decimation of the Tories, however. A troubled campaign undermined Campbell's chances of success. At the very least Campbell needed a strong campaign to squelch the collective Canadian memory of the Mulroney government. Although she started with a discussion of a "new" politics, by refusing to discuss policy, focusing on the deficit and resorting to negative and offensive advertising, Campbell only succeeded in showing Canadians a Conservative government would continue to operate in a backroom, elitist style.

Now, Canada is opening a new chapter in its political history, a chapter that, despite our bland polite nature, is bound to be a challenging exploration of the nuances of Canadian federalism.

The Opposition Party:

Amazingly, the position of official opposition is held by a party dedicated to separation. With the Bloc Quebecois forming the official opposition, daily discourse and question period in the House of Commons now takes on a whole new meaning.

Recent reports note Lucien Bouchard is committed to playing the traditional role of the opposition party by expressing the interests of all Canadians. But how confident is the rest of Canada that his stated commitment will translate into effective representation? The Bloc is premised on the separatist ambitions of Quebec and is by definition not interested in extraneous issues — such as the continued feeling of alienation in the western provinces.

Can a party born in one province with all of its constituents in one province responsibly speak for all Canadians — regardless of which province the party originates?

The same can be said for the Liberal party, with the majority of their support in Ontario and the East, and the Reform party with the majority of their support coming from Alberta and British Columbia. At least, however, these parties attempt to speak for all Canadians.

It would be hard for anyone to be convinced that Bouchard will take seriously national interests. The Bloc Quebecois with its roots in sovereignty will naturally find it difficult not to revert back to constitutional issues.

However, it is conceivable to suggest that with the Bloc as the official opposition, Bouchard will be forced to conform to parliamentary convention and, therefore, not be able to cast loosely based judgments and criticisms on a federal government. This would effectively weaken the ability of the Bloc to achieve its separatist aims.

Furthermore, a Bloc opposition — which defines itself as somewhere between the Liberals and the NDP — will curb the effectiveness of the Reform party's conservative ambitions.

The Reform Party:

Despite the fact the Reform Party has attempted to expand its constituency in Ontario and the rest of Canada, its concerns do remain based largely in the west. Without Preston Manning continually in the spotlight, there is a chance for discussion to involve federal political issues, and not just regional interests. Western concerns are not insignificant, however. They have been silenced for too long and without attention threaten to deepen the cleavages Canada needs to overcome. But there is danger in a federal political party whose sole interests lie in a particular region in Canada.

Bilingualism:

The Reform Party is well known for its stance against bilingualism. While many Canadians are unopposed to bilingualism, many French Canadians rely on this policy in English Canada. Under the Reform one sees potential for this interest to go unattended. It will be up to Jean Chretien to provide strong leadership for all Canadians in this area.

Official Party Status:

The other two parties representing the national interest, as from the National Party and the Natural Law Party, have lost official party status. To obtain or maintain this status, the party must hold at least twelve seats. Both the NDP and the Tories failed to achieve this status. More than just a national embarrassment, this represents a major funding loss.

Because they no longer have official party status, they are not eligible to be listed on tax forms for tax-deductible party contributions.

Parliamentary Discourse:

The Conservatives, given the corporate nature of their financial support, will likely bounce back. Given its grassroots background, the NDP, on the other hand, will likely suffer from this drawback. Both will suffer from lack of access to parliamentary resources including research staff, communication facilities and office space. This will no doubt affect the role these parties play in parliamentary discourse, as well as their ability to represent the voices of many Canadians who supported them — though that support was not translated into seats.

It will be interesting to see what happens at the time of the next federal election. Will the Conservatives and the NDP be sitting in front of the T.V. with Mel Hurtig watching the debates? Will the conventions of Canadian federalism change to reflect the shifting patterns of Canadian politics?

Voices in Parliament:

Despite the huge Liberal majority, many Canadians are concerned that particular voices will not be heard in parliamentary debate. Quebec interests now have a permanent voice in the form of the Bloc Quebecois. Western Canadian interests now enjoy a unified voice in the Reform Party. With this newly secured presence in federal politics for these specific interests, the lack of vocal representation is emphasized.

Despite the fact there are more women in Parliament than ever before, this gain is really only marginal and tends to be limited to the Liberal Party. Women and native interests are conspicuously absent from parliamentary discourse. These issues were never adequately represented, but with "specific interest" parties being formed, women and natives are in danger of being left out of politics all together. It is not a reassuring thought to be relying on any of the three major parties to champion the causes of Canadian women and aboriginal peoples.

With the Reform party focused on economic issues and the Bloc centred on its constitutional interests, it will be up to the Liberal government to keep these voices active. Unfortunately, the specific goals of the two major opposition parties will make this task difficult for Chretien.

Chretien:

Chretien's ability to counter the pressures of the other significant parties will start with his cabinet appointments. It will be up to him to decide how social and economic issues are played out during his term. A cabinet full of "blue" Liberals is less likely to communicate the importance of social issues than a left of centre cabinet.

Provincial elections:

This federal election will also have serious ramifications for provincial elections to come. The support for the Bloc does not necessarily mean citizens of Quebec will throw their support behind the Parti Quebecois. In fact, many Quebecers who voted for the Bloc in this election were registering a protest vote. Their votes do not necessarily mean they want to separate and Bouchard has recognized the fact. Needless to say, however, the overwhelming support for the Bloc in Quebec has many Canadians worried. Support for separatist movements in Quebec may seem cyclical. The hope is that this cooperation and spirit of community that the students now feel, continue throughout their education and stay in Kingston. The students will take with them and into their careers, the feelings and sense of community and love for Kingston they have developed. I hope that they will become true ambassadors for Kingston, and share the spirit and love of Kingston, with the World, as they fan out to work around the globe.

The Political Process:

After last Monday, Canadian citizens assessing the new balance of power and questioning the political process in Canada works. The close margin on the position party had many Canadians asking which party was more deserving. Should the opposition party be determined by seats? Should the popular vote come into play? The Conservative Party, with only two seats, in fact had more popular support than the Bloc Quebecois and yet their ability to represent those Canadians has been severely hampered.

The next few days, the new weeks and certainly the next few years will be historic. Canadian politics appears to have entered a new realm of representation. As political pundits talked about cynicism, Canadians registered their frustrations and hopes on ballots last Monday creating a new political landscape. The global economy will play its part in this successful this landscape process. It is also up to the politicians to answer the concerns of all Canadians that will decide the outcome of this most recent democratic experience.

Homecoming

The Editor,
I wish to take this opportunity to extend a thank you to those groups which have since September 1993, endeavoured and achieved a most wonderful level of excellent Town/Gown relations. The difference between the past years and this year, are immeasurable. I have lived in the 200 block areas of William St. for the past five years, and this year has been the most quiet, livable and enjoyable.

Many thanks must be extended to many groups, and I hope this letter will get to those which I may have missed. Some of the groups who have worked very hard on solving many, of the what has been, a long history of past and persistent problems are: AMS, City Police, City Hall staff, members of the many councils, committees (student and city), the S.T.A.N.D and Sydenham Ward ratepayer's associations, but most importantly, the students, who must now feel part of the community and not apart or indifferent to it.

I wish that a thank you, a genuine thanks, be extended to the students, alumni and staff of Queen's, from myself and hopefully by the citizens of Kingston and city council. The hope is that this cooperation and spirit of community that the students now feel, continue throughout their education and stay in Kingston. The students will take with them and into their careers, the feelings and sense of community and love for Kingston they have developed. I hope that they will become true ambassadors for Kingston, and share the spirit and love of Kingston, with the World, as they fan out to work around the globe.

Censorship

The Editor,
The recent NO vote for Surface funding is an alarming occurrence in this institution. It has sent a warning to marginalized voices on campus that will not go unnoticed. Surface is a controversial paper, it was meant to be such as per its constitution. It is a tremendously unique publication that may help to educate, communicate but more importantly it was a forum for expression for marginalized voices in society. It was a way of understanding the problems, anguish, and pain that marginalized individuals faced, it was illuminating. The elimination of Surface from this community will send powerful messages to marginalized people that will have negative consequences for everyone. Firstly, Surface was a forum for expression, eliminating this forum consequently eliminates important voices, it is silencing. Secondly, the elimination of Surface sends a signal of intolerance to marginalized people: your views are not welcome here, go somewhere else! Thirdly, the elimination of Surface restricts public discourse. Although the Journal may have feature articles for these voices, Surface was wholly dedicated to getting the messages out, The Jour-

The Editor,
I am writing to clear up a number of factual errors which appeared in your editorial of October 25 on Alfie's Pub. The editorial states that "...Alfie's has twice been shut down early for lack of attendance..." This is not the case. Alfie's has only closed early once due to technical difficulties with the stereo.

nal does not have such a mandate and therefore has no obligation to do so.

Andrew Dick and Michael Carnegie (the NO campaigners) throughout the campaign maintained that Surface does not represent Arts and Science students and therefore students should not financially support it. This statement is odd, Surface for the last few years tackled issues of racism, sexism, homophobia, ableism, classism, anti-feminism, and the environment in every single issue. To say that these issues do not represent Arts and Science students is erroneous or perhaps the No campaigners were suggesting that these concerns are not concerns of Arts and Science students.

It would seem logical that since ASUS students on the whole are very concerned about social problems that the referendum was not motivated by $59 for every student and it was not motivated by "representation". Rather, it was motivated by Surface's unique mandate and the issues that it confronted. In other words, Dick and Carnegie are a minority of thought on campus who used Neo-Nazi and right-wing propaganda scare and fear tactics to extinguish a paper that they felt threatened by and that they did not agree with. In short, they do not feel that marginalized voices should be heard or marginalized voices do not deserve access to a public forum. I call this censorship, and it sets a dangerous precedent for the other media, it restricts freedom of the press and of speech. Both Dick and Carnegie are ASUS representatives and they have an obligation to the Queen's community of representing the students in a fair and democratic manner. In my opinion they have abused their positions by mis-representing ASUS students by claiming that the issues in Surface do not represent them.

Marginalised voices will not die, we will find other avenues. It is shameful, however, that in this institution that prides itself on collegiality and academic elitism we find some of the most intolerant individuals. It is a sorry state.

What do you see in the future for Canada?

Andrew Dick and Michael Carnegie (the NO campaigners) throughout the campaign maintained that Surface does not represent Arts and Science students and therefore students should not financially support it. This statement is odd, Surface for the last few years tackled issues of racism, sexism, homophobia, ableism, classism, anti-feminism, and the environment in every single issue. To say that these issues do not represent Arts and Science students is erroneous or perhaps the No campaigners were suggesting that these concerns are not concerns of Arts and Science students.

It would seem logical that since ASUS students on the whole are very concerned about social problems that the referendum was not motivated by $59 for every student and it was not motivated by "representation". Rather, it was motivated by Surface's unique mandate and the issues that it confronted. In other words, Dick and Carnegie are a minority of thought on campus who used Neo-Nazi and right-wing propaganda scare and fear tactics to extinguish a paper that they felt threatened by and that they did not agree with. In short, they do not feel that marginalized voices should be heard or marginalized voices do not deserve access to a public forum. OPEN FORUM

The Editor,
I wish to take this opportunity to extend a thank you to those groups which have since September 1993, endeavoured and achieved a most wonderful level of excellent Town/Gown relations. The difference between the past years and this year, are immeasurable. I have lived in the 200 block areas of William St. for the past five years, and this year has been the most quiet, livable and enjoyable.

Many thanks must be extended to many groups, and I hope this letter will get to those which I may have missed. Some of the groups who have worked very hard on solving many, of the what has been, a long history of past and persistent problems are: AMS, City Police, City Hall staff, members of the many councils, committees (student and city), the S.T.A.N.D and Sydenham Ward ratepayer's associations, but most importantly, the students, who must now feel part of the community and not apart or indifferent to it.

I wish that a thank you, a genuine thanks, be extended to the students, alumni and staff of Queen's, from myself and hopefully by the citizens of Kingston and city council. The hope is that this cooperation and spirit of community that the students now feel, continue throughout their education and stay in Kingston. The students will take with them and into their careers, the feelings and sense of community and love for Kingston they have developed. I hope that they will become true ambassadors for Kingston, and share the spirit and love of Kingston, with the World, as they fan out to work around the globe.

Censorship

The Editor,
The recent NO vote for Surface funding is an alarming occurrence in this institution. It has sent a warning to marginalized voices on campus that will not go unnoticed. Surface is a controversial paper, it was meant to be such as per its constitution. It is a tremendously unique publication that may help to educate, communicate but more importantly it was a forum for expression for marginalized voices in society. It was a way of understanding the problems, anguish, and pain that marginalized individuals faced, it was illuminating. The elimination of Surface from this community will send powerful messages to marginalized people that will have negative consequences for everyone. Firstly, Surface was a forum for expression, eliminating this forum consequently eliminates important voices, it is silencing. Secondly, the elimination of Surface sends a signal of intolerance to marginalized people: your views are not welcome here, go somewhere else! Thirdly, the elimination of Surface restricts public discourse. Although the Journal may have feature articles for these voices, Surface was wholly dedicated to getting the messages out, The Jour-

Features

Proud and loyal Progressive Conservatives across Canada are still reeling from the Monday night massacre – the electoral annihilation of '93. The voters are entitled to deliver their verdict, but one wonders if the sentence they handed down – a federal caucus small enough to meet in one of former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's shoe closets – is not cruel and unusual punishment.

As shocking as Monday's dismal result was, even more painful for many Tories is the acknowledgement that our party did not deserve to win: we gave Canadians no reason to vote Conservative and they responded to our invitation in droves. To lose is disheartening; to offer no justification for victory is embarrassing, and this election campaign left many party members embarrassed to be Conservatives.

The Conservatives earned their humiliation, but only partly. Beyond the leadership of the party and the election campaign, other forces – namely the rise of Reform and the Bloc – were at work. Now, Tories committed to the future are beginning to ask what went wrong, and how the Conservatives can rebuild.

Leadership

Prime Minister Campbell began the year as an immensely popular candidate to replace Mr. Mulroney. She was engaging, bright, refreshing, bilingual, young, female and from the west coast. She represented something new and exciting, and Canadians responded to the opportunity for change and renewal. Then she began to campaign. As the spring turned into summer, Ms. Campbell was effective at convincing Canadians to like her less. She managed to convert an overwhelming lead into a narrow 52% leadership victory. Had the campaign continued any longer, she most certainly would have been successful at snatching defeat from the jaws of victory.

Yet in the general election campaign, the decision was made to hang the Conservative campaign on Ms. Campbell's leadership, especially as Liberal leader Jean Chretien was viewed as out-of-date and out-of-touch. Again Ms. Campbell went to work, again with impressive results. In 47 days she went from having the highest public approval ratings of any Prime Minister in three decades to trailing badly. For Ms. Campbell and her strategists to make the same mistake twice in the space of six months demonstrates either an inability to learn from past errors or a stubborn unwillingness to realize that Canadians found her less mesmerizing than she found herself.

Jean Charest has predictably called for all Tories to rally 'round the leader, fearing that some Tories might be plotting against her. His worries are misplaced: nobody will waste time trying to kill Ms. Campbell's leadership – it is already dead. The corpse is still warm though, and it would be polite to allow Ms. Campbell to arrange the manner and timing of her own burial.

The Campaign

Ms. Campbell's greatest failing was presiding over a national campaign that could not have been more out of touch with Canadians' aspirations and expectations, or more poorly executed. Leaving aside her personal blunders, the campaign strategists made three colossal errors: deciding to make the Tory campaign a policy-free zone, mishandling the deficit issue, and adopting an advertising strategy that was at best mystifying and at worst offensive.

The Campbell team did not understand the importance policy had during the Mulroney years. Even when Mr. Mulroney was at his lowest levels of public esteem, his government had a full policy agenda: tax reform, international trade, foreign affairs, constitutional initiatives, and attempts at fiscal restraint.

When Mr. Mulroney resigned, the party had a chance to choose not only a new leader – to neutralize the anti-Mulroney hatred in the electorate – but to seek a new policy mandate for a new government. But when the decision was made to avoid all policy discussion – not to have a Throne Speech or a new budget, for example – all that was left for the electorate was the leader. Ms. Campbell, without a policy agenda to campaign on, entered the election naked – without even the protection of her legal robes.

The biggest gaffe of the campaign occurred when Ms. Campbell said election campaigns were not the place for policy discussion. After the release of the Liberal and Reform platforms, Canadians realized that what Ms. Campbell meant was that the Conservative campaign was no place for policy discussion. Combining zero policy with uninspired leadership, all that was left of the Conservative party was its record – the record that generated the oft irrational hatred of Mr. Mulroney.

Even on the one issue that Ms. Campbell talked about ad nauseam – the deficit – there was no coherent policy. The deficit reduction "plan" unveiled during the campaign was an unbelievable fraud, consisting of fantastic assumptions augmented only by outright misrepresentations.

This flimsy program was to be the centrepiece of a third term. But the deficit issue was not tied to any broader vision of the country, or any broader economic policy. The deficit became an end in itself. Consequently, the Conservatives were promising continued sacrifice when Canadians were looking for hope.

It is easy to sympathize with those in charge of Conservative advertising. With no message and an ineffective messenger, what is an advertiser to do? Retreat to banality. The campaign slogan, "It's time" was stupid, but fitting: nobody knew what it meant because it did not mean anything.

Even after the initial ads were junked, no message emerged except to criticize other parties. With the Chretien ads, the advertising campaign stopped being merely useless and became actively damaging. Calling attention to Mr. Chretien's facial disfigurement or inability to speak either official language properly was not only offensive, but atrocious political judgement.

The disastrous Conservative campaign forfeited the election to the Liberals who, in contrast, ran a focused, coherent, competent campaign. When the election was called, the Conservatives and Liberals were about even in the national polls, at about 35 per cent. The Liberals did not move at all until the last few days, when they jumped up to win a huge majority. Meanwhile, the Conservatives collapsed as voters, concluding that the Conservatives had nothing to offer, went looking elsewhere. They found two new options available to them.

The Regional Parties

Although a good campaign and better leadership would have ensured at least a respectable showing, the Conservatives nonetheless faced a challenge from the changing political landscape. Growing frustration with the inability of the federal government to reduce the deficit – while significantly raising taxes – and to lay to rest the "Quebec" question was eroding the Conservative base. Mr. Mulroney's grand alliance had brought together true conservatives, traditional national-minded Tories, Westerners, small-town Ontarians, disgruntled Maritimers, and Quebecers frustrated by the federal system.

That alliance began to come apart even in the 1988 election, as some groups left the coalition. But without any suitable alternative, most voters favoured the Conservatives again. In 1993, the rise of Reform and the Bloc Quebecois gave voters a clear choice to opt out of the national Conservative coalition. Voters chose instead to elect MPs more closely aligned with their own regional interest. With the Conservatives presenting no national vision, regionalism destroyed the grand Mulroney alliance.

The glue for Mr. Mulroney's coalition was policy, not his Irish charm or dispensations of patronage. Without a new policy vision, there was nothing to unite the fractious elements of the Mulroney coalition. As a result, the 1988 Conservative vote was split the Bloc, which do not aspire to national status.

Second, the vision must be conservative. It must address the limitations of government, and the need to modernize the economy to face more fierce global competition. It must seek to reduce the burden of roughly three ways in 1993, with a third going to the Reform and a third to the Bloc Quebecois. Add to that mix the collapse of the New Democratic Party and the resultant shift of votes to the Liberals, and the dynamics behind the new Parliament become clear.

The last Parliament had one national party caucus (Conservatives) and two largely regional parties (Liberals and NDP), albeit with national visions. The new Parliament features one national party (Liberals) and two regional parties (Reform and Bloc), the former with a regional vision and the latter with a separatist vision. By the time of the next election, Canadians may want an alternative to the Liberals; will they have another national party to turn to? With the Progressive Conservatives?

"The campaign slogan, 'It's Time' was stupid, but fitting; nobody knew what it meant because it did not mean anything."

Rebuilding the Party

Engineering the return of the Progressive Conservatives to national office will be no easy task. Since Confederation, there have been only three periods of sustained Conservative rule consisting of at least two terms in office: Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Robert Laird Borden during the first world war, and Mr. Mulroney. Each government had a national vision, that sought to bridge the divisions of race, region, religion and language. A new vision is needed for the twenty-first century.

That vision must have three characteristics. First, it must be national, seeking to address the aspirations of all regions in the country, including but not limited to French and English Canadians. It will be challenging to develop such a vision in an environment dominated by a Liberal party which holds its constitutional vision of the past, competing against the Reform and

A Woman's place is in the House

"The Reform Party makes John Cross look like Gloria Steinem"

- Judy Rebick, Former President, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women

After the votes were counted on Monday night, 54 out of the 295 seats in the House of Commons had been won by women. This represents an increase of 16 female MPs from the 1988 election. But was the 1993 federal election a victory for feminists and women in general? I think the most appropriate answer would be a qualified 'no.'

While it is significant that Canadians have elected a House of Commons composed of almost twenty per cent women, there were many disturbing elements of the election campaign which I think will have a very profound influence on the status of Canadian women over the next four years.

Conventional wisdom coming out of the Tory leadership campaign was that if even the Conservatives had the 'guts' to elect a woman as leader, the political world must really be ready for women. The presence of Audrey McLaughlin as NDP leader was said to add further credibility to the claim that the invisible barrier to women in politics had finally been cast aside.

In support of this hypothesis, throughout the campaign I think we saw a definite trend toward the 'personalization' of gender in politics. Campbell and McLaughlin's identities as women were seen as incidental; their gender was a quality that was related more to their personalities than their political agendas. While it is a positive development that female politicians are no longer pigeonholed into representing a 'narrow' interest group (women), I think in this campaign we ended up losing sight of the fact that, as the feminist slogan goes, "the personal is political." What I mean by this is that by underplaying the gender of these prominent politicians, Canadians lost an opportunity to bring gender issues to a more prominent position on the political agenda. I think there should be a respect for women as capable politicians as well as a recognition that their identity as women should have some influence on their political agendas.

Kim Campbell herself managed to marginalize her status as a woman by making her weight, her clothes and her sex life objects of ridicule. She played on the stereotype of the single, frigid woman by speaking about her life as "unspeakably lonely." She focused attention on her appearance and not her ability by discussing her wide hips. No doubt this was in some senses a strategic move to belittle her 'less admirable' feminine traits, but it ended up drawing attention to them and perpetuating negative stereotypes.

In terms of policy, why did the political establishment, including the media, sideline women's issues in this election? It's possible to attribute this phenomenon to the overriding importance of other issues such as the deficit and job creation, but what this explanation doesn't recognize is that women, as a marginalized group representing over 50 per cent of the population, have a unique and politically important perspective on every issue that was tackled in this election campaign.

For example, a discussion of job creation programs is only partial if it neglects the fact that most unemployed people are women, and that women face specific challenges when trying to find a job (like discrimination and sexual harassment). In addition, if politicians are really interested in getting Canada working, they have to have a coherent strategy of national child care which enables women to pursue employment on an equal basis as men.

The Reform Party's platform makes no pretense of appealing to the feminist agenda. In fact, Reform has explicitly stated that it believes in 'family values', a thinly veiled euphemism for 'barefoot and pregnant.' With Reform's strong presence in the House of Commons, it seems likely that this attitude will be publicly expressed again and again during the next four years. I certainly hope that the increased presence of women in the House will counteract this tendency, but I think because most of these women were forced to run their campaigns as 'people' not 'women' in order to avoid an anti-woman backlash, they may be reluctant to pursue explicitly feminist agendas.

The decimation of the NDP in Monday's election also has consequences for gender issues and policies. Without an unabashedly pro-feminist progressive party in a strong opposition position, we can expect Parliament's priorities to shy away from women's issues.

The composition of the remainder of the opposition in the House is even less encouraging. Only seven of the 52 Reform members are women (due no doubt to their stubborn resistance to run women in winnable ridings) and only nine of the 54 Bloc Quebecois members are women. As far as I can tell, neither of these parties consider women's issues a top priority, and thus the bulk of the opposition can be seen as fairly reticent when it comes to keeping the government in line on these issues.

The media can also accept some of the responsibility for low visibility of women's issues. While it is true that the media played a role in pointing out the more questionable elements of the Reform agenda, they tended to concentrate more on the racist rather than sexist elements in the party. In fact, it seems to me that commentators in the media took it for granted that the Reform Party contained an element of old-style sexism about which nothing could be really be done. The backlash against feminism that North America has seen in the past five years or so has made this kind of passive acceptance of sexist attitudes acceptable.

The one ray of hope that has emerged in this election is that for the first time in history, the Conservative caucus is 50 per cent women! Certainly we can't forget also that the number of women in the House of Commons has risen by sixteen since 1988. But overall, the federal election of 1993 will not be remembered by feminists as a progressive step in the struggle for equality.

Alison Masekann is a fourth-year Politics and Sociology student, and sexism is one of her many pet peeves.

Le vrai pouvoir?

If Bloc Quebecois leader Lucien Bouchard gets his way, a party bent on taking Quebec out of Canada will become Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (or the "not-so-Loyal Opposition," as Preston Manning puts it). But will Canada be entering another round of constitutional paralysis in the months to come? Is the Bloc's success in Quebec, electing 54 members out of Quebec's 75 ridings, a message to the rest of the country that the fires of separatism have been rekindled and Quebec sovereigntists will finally take la belle province out of confederation?

When Peter Mansbridge announced the Quebec results Monday night, complete with the CBC's cool House of Commons computer graphic showing not only the Liberal sea-of-red majority, but the extent of the Bloc's electoral appeal, he was telling us what we already knew.

But Quebecers I spoke with before the election were adamant that a vote for the Bloc would not be a vote for separation, and even anglophones in Quebec, speaking after the vote, seemed to agree.

Monique Beaudin, despite her French-sounding name, is a bilingual anglophone from the Cornwall area who now works for the Montreal Gazette.

"It's not like people are running around waving the [Quebec] flag here," Beaudin said the day after the election. She told me the mood in Quebec isn't intense at all, and in fact, the rest of Canada seems much more concerned about separation than Quebecers are.

"Something like 20 per cent of the Bloc's votes were from federalists ... it was a protest vote. They're kind of a Quebec version of the Reform Party," Beaudin said.

Quebecers just didn't think the Liberals or Conservatives would represent their interests in Ottawa, and this was the driving force behind the Bloc's popularity, not sovereignty, she said.

"Polls consistently show soft support for sovereignty," Beaudin said. However, some sovereigntists are taking this result as sign that Quebec is definitely ready to leave, including Parti Quebecois leader Jacques Parizeau.

"Parizeau had a big boner on [Monday] night," joked Beaudin. After reading his remarks in La Presse Wednesday, it is apparent the PQ leader believes the Bloc's showing represents a vote for sovereignty. Parizeau said he believed many separatists actually voted for Liberal and Tory candidates, and so support for sovereignty is even higher than the polls suggest.

But not everybody buys this. The tone of the debate hasn't changed. It will no doubt gain more prominence, and garner more resentment from the rest of Canada with the size of the Bloc's presence in Ottawa, however.

"Some anglophones are worried," Beaudin conceded. "I have friends who said 'Oh my God, I'm packing my stuff and getting on the 401 tomorrow.'"

But anglophones have been leaving Quebec in droves for decades, and Monday's vote, and the popularity of the PQ, really haven't phased Beaudin. "I intend to stay in Montreal indefinitely."

Even with the Bloc front and centre in the House of Commons, Prime Minister-elect Jean Chretien says Quebecers don't want to talk about sovereignty, they want to talk about jobs.

And the province is typically ambiguous politically. After voting in a separatist PQ government in 1976, Quebec voted "no" in a referendum on sovereignty in 1980.

McGill Tribune Editor-in-chief Benoit Jacquotte was at the Bloc Quebecois post-election party in Montreal, and he said, at the most, 300 people showed up to celebrate. Compared to the crowd-counts at other events Montrealers take to the streets for, like Stanley Cup wins and Guns 'n' Roses concert cancellations, this number is actually pretty negligible.

So according to Jacquotte, the sovereignty question is still very much up in the air. And despite being a party with only one policy, the Bloc appears to be ready and eager to discuss issues besides just Quebec's independence. Jacquotte spoke to Gilles Duceppe, the Bloc MP who appears to be Bouchard's right-hand man, about policies other than separation, and Duceppe told him the party's political ideology will fall "somewhere between the Liberals and the NDP."

That's kind of strange for a party led by a former member of Mulroney's cabinet. Jacquotte also added that it was kind of strange for a Bloc member to be talking about something other than sovereignty. I wonder how long the Bloc will avoid crumbling, with members coming from all sides of the political spectrum with only a separatist slant to unite them.

The Tribune's Assistant Editor Michael Broadhurst, was also well positioned on election night, hanging out in Shawinigan for Chretien's win. He wandered around the town talking to residents about who they had supported, and the lines he saw were drawn very clearly. Middle-aged and older Quebecers predominantly voted for Chretien's Liberals, but the vast majority of young voters he spoke with, and especially first-time voters, cast their ballots for the Bloc. Broadhurst said Bloc voters may not have been sure on separatism, but they were sure that the traditional parties had nothing to offer them.

But for my narrow Ontario anglophone consciousness, this still won't do. I can't help feeling that Quebec separation, someday, is inevitable. I don't particularly like the idea, and I feel Canadian federalism has done a lot to protect Quebec's identity. Canada is not Canada without the Montreal Canadiens, the Chateau Frontenac and Carnaval (not to mention Hull and Poutine).

A French-Canadian friend of mine, who, in fact, calls herself a federalist, explained to me why the drive to separate is so pronounced, especially in the province's youth. It's an argument I still can't respond to.

She asked me to imagine that English Canada, with its institutions and heritage, was part of the United States. Add to that the presumption that the U.S. spoke a different language.

"Wouldn't you join the separatist movement?" she asked.

Tennis Gaels are champs

BY ANDREA MATTHEW
The Queen's Journal

As the team van travelled back towards Queen's along the long 401 highway, ten anxious yet exhausted women pondered sipping champagne from the OWIAA trophy. Early season victories and huge team spirit contributed to what some would call the greatest domination of the OWIAA team tennis championships yet. Completing the regular season play in second place only made the women's team hungrier for a little sweet revenge on Western.

The squad left for Toronto cramped in an over-heated van, driven by super-coach John McFarlane. The van was also filled with racquets, "good luck stuffed moons," assistant coach Mike Lewicki, and an awfully lucky anonymous member of the men's team. The travelling squad was Bali Athwal, Lisa Bradford, Nancy Ip, Pam Lewis, Heather MacDonnell, Moira Malvestutto, Andrea Matthew, Nicky Myslivecek, Miko Thompson and Marie Josee Young.

The team took on the McMaster Marauders who had finished third in regular season. Balls smashed, Mac girls screeched, strings broke and coaches cheered while the Golden Gaels minced the Mac team to a pulp. The series was cleaned up six matches to three and moved the grinning Gaels to the finals where they would meet Western's athletes on Saturday.

The team celebrated at The Keg, but the bottomless diet sodas had players tumbling in their beds (some in cots - Lisa and Andrea) in the hope of falling asleep. Six thirty in the morning sure makes for lethargic and slow motor skills, but the women's Gaels really "whooped" over to York, where Lisa Bradford and Miko Thompson took on one of the most frustrating doubles teams from Western.

The atrocious line calls and obnoxious court demeanour of Jen Pertsch of Western was cause for Queen's to request an umpire. The Gaels proceeded to walk all over the Western players, beginning a serious plot to blow the Western girls out of the tennis bubble.

Andrea Matthew and Nancy Ip fought hard to help bring the Gaels to gold, but Western's line-up changes resulted in matches against talent too tough to overcome.

Marie Josee Young found herself against the infamous Pertsch of Western. MJ had to deal with Pertsch calling a shot that was 3 feet in 'out'. Marie Jo, as expected, also had to call an umpire on the lowly Pertsch.

Pam Lewis overlooked the obnoxious Western cheering section to defeat an under-18 national player in straight sets. Bali Athwal completely demolished her opponent, leaving her limping back to her teammates still thinking they had a chance for gold.

Western's addition skills were so lacking they did not realize Queen's had already won enough matches to capture the gold medals! Micky Myslivecek, who was sporting a handsome lead in number one, was called off the court to help celebrate the championship win.

Rookies Moira Malvestutto and Heather MacDonnell were so supportive and provided the essential link in the Golden Chain on championship day, and had strong wins throughout the season.

Clad in gold medallions, carrying the grand OWIAA cup, and sporting the 1993-94 championship banner, the women's tennis team had captured the title in the fewest matches and by the greatest spread in years.

VARSIY SOCCER

Ryerson rocked by Gaels

BY DAN MCNAIR
The Queen's Journal

The annual Queen's Old Boys Homecoming soccer game was played last weekend and it provided the present team with an opportunity to play against some of the players that figure so proudly in the annals of Queen's soccer history.

It also meant that the Men's Soccer team would have some valuable and inspiring support as they faced Ryerson for the last game of the season. The game was essentially a formality as a play-off berth had already been assured for the Gaels and the outcome would not have affected the season standings. However, it was imperative that Queen's impress their distinguished supporters with a positive result. Unfortunately, no one explained this to the Ryerson team, because they recorded probably one of the worst disciplinary performances in the OUAA East this season.

The conduct of the Queen's team throughout the game was exemplary, their performance was symbolic of the clean style of play that has long been associated with Queen's soccer.

Ryerson had three of their players sent off for offenses varying from late and vicious tackles to dissent, their behaviour marred what would have otherwise been an entertaining game.

Regardless, Rick Boomgaardt established himself as the dominant offensive force on the Queen's team, as he scored two goals that enabled him to lead the squad in scoring this season. Boomgaardt finished his campaign with a total of seven goals, that is an impressive feat considering his role as a defender on the team. Strikers Jonathan Soler and Ken Butler trailed Boomgaardt by one and two goals respectively.

Jonathan Soler opened the scoring against Ryerson with a picturesque diving header courtesy of a precise cross by Nick Thomas. This was possibly the most impressive goal of the day. Boomgaardt provided Queen's with their second marker shortly before the end of the first half, when he drove home a poor defence clearance.

In the latter half Queen's were afforded an opportunity to utilize one of their set plays. Midfielder Oan Cheney executed a perfect throw-in that allowed defender Brendan Johnson to climb well above the Ryerson keeper and nod home Queen's third goal. Just minutes later striker Jonathan Soler eluded his marker to find enough space to control, shoot, and score the Gaels' penultimate goal.

Shortly before the end of the game another set play provided Queens with their fifth and final goal. Captain Marc Labrom directed the free kick towards the far post and an unmarked Boomgaardt, who made sure that he did not squander his opportunity to become the Golden Gaels top scorer. The end result was Queen's 5, Ryerson 0.

In the latter half of the 1993 season Queen's scored 19 goals and conceded only 3, their 5 goals against Ryerson made them the best offensive team in the OUAA East with 29 goals in total. A promising statistic considering their upcoming semi-final game against one of the OUAA's toughest teams - the Carleton Ravens, who, incidentally, possess the league's most frugal defense.

FRANK & EARNEST

'93 Jays found ways to amaze

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

Along with champagne to celebrate the Toronto Blue Jays' back-2-back World Series championships, your humble ink-stained wretch also consumed a large plate of crow. According to this space in April, you see, the Jays would win 88 games and finish third in the American League East in 1993, behind Baltimore and the Yankees.

Jays make pundits eat crow

"Not enough pitching," the naysayers crowed. "Good pitching always beats good hitting," read the age-old baseball dictum. "Too hard to repeat with free agency," prophets shrieked. The chorus of pundits was soon joined by this sweet tenor.

Well, I'm glad the Jays proved me wrong! Although Toronto's mound corps struggled dreadfully at times in 1993, as 10-9 losses seemingly alternated with 8-7 wins, most other teams proved to have even worse pitching problems. Expansion, the shrinking strike zone, and baseballs that supposedly had extra-tight windings were all blamed for a season-long scoring rampage, fittingly climaxed by Toronto's 15-14 win over the Philadelphia Phillies in the zany fourth game of the Fall Classic. That was the highest-scoring post-season game ever - by seven runs! Amazing!

Number one starter Jack Morris, who won 21 games for the Jays in 1992 and 18 for the Minnesota Twins in 1991, became every Jay Junkie's favourite whipping boy in 1993, going 7-12 with a stratospheric 6.19 ERA. Morris and his $5.15 million (U.S.) salary were released on Monday when the Jays passed on his 1994 option and bought him out for $1 million. One illustration of baseball's pitching shortage is rampant speculation the Jays will now try to re-sign the 38-year-old Morris for 1994 at a much lower price. Morris didn't even pitch after Sept. 9 as the Jays won everything in sight.

Pitchers' early injuries overcome

Long forgotten now is the fact that pitchers Morris, Dave Stewart, Todd Stottlemyre, and Al Leiter each spent several weeks on the disabled list before the All-Star break. Those four comprised two-thirds of the Jays' six-man starting rotation. However, Pat Hentgen, who won five games in 1992, came out of the bullpen to win 19 in 1993 - Amazing! Who knew? Leiter, who pitched all of ONE INNING in the majors in 1992, went 9-6 - Amazing! Who knew? Juan Guzman (14-3) and ALCS MVP Stewart pitched well down the stretch drive and into the post-season.

Danny Cox, Tony Castillo, Mark Eichhorn, Mike Timlin, and Woody Williams, none of whom are household names, all contributed out of the bullpen. Closer Duane Ward proved in the World Series to be vastly superior to Phillie Phanatic (Wild Thing) Williams, who tanked Philadelphia leads in games four and six. The fireballing Wild Thing, who pitches like his hair is aflame, will be perpetually burned in effigy by fans in the so-called City of Brotherly Love.

Jays' batting champ John Olerud (.363), Series MVP Paul Molitor (.332) and Roberto Alomar (.326) finished 1-2-3 in AL hitting - Amazing! Who knew? Never before in league history had three teammates done that, and with 14 teams such a feat is tougher than ever. Devon White, Pat Borders, Ed Sprague and Series hero Joe Carter all had solid seasons. Tony Fernandez and Rickey Henderson arrived in trades, giving Toronto more ways to win than other teams.

Three football Gaels chosen as All-Stars

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

The 1993 OQIFC All-Star team was announced on Monday, and each of the six conference teams had at least two players selected. Gone are the days when the choices were dominated by Queen's and Bishop's - the OQIFC was much more competitive this year.

Three members of the 1993 Queen's Golden Gaels were picked.

Halfback/slotback Paul Kozan (Arts '94), a four-year Gael from Regina, made the team at running back for the second straight year. Kozan rushed for 223 yards on 38 carries, caught 30 passes for a league-leading 558 yards, returned 8 kickoffs for 162 yards, and scored 4 touchdowns. Kozan really came into his own in 1993 as a game-breaking threat.

Offensive tackle Mark Robinson (Sci '94), also a four-year Gael from Haliburton, Ontario, was honoured for the first time. Robinson, at 6'2", 295 lbs, has been a mainstay of the offensive line since he began starting for Queen's as a freshman. He is a ferocious run-blocker who, together with his fellow linemen, deserves much of the credit for the Gaels' dominant rushing attack, which was the foundation of their 1992 national championship.

The only Queen's defender to earn All-Star recognition was defensive halfback

Mark Morrison (Law '95), a five-year veteran from Okotoks, Alberta. The gutsy and often overlooked Morrison made the team for the first time. Morrison has long been a vital component of an excellent Gaels' defensive secondary, which played such a major role in Queen's Vanier title. He also performed yeoman service in returning 34 punts for 235 yards in 1993.

Notable choices from other teams included Bishop's quarterback Jim Murphy (the only unanimous pick), return specialist Chris Banton of Ottawa, inside receivers Steve Papp of McGill and Mike Noble of Concordia, and defensive tackle Harry Van Hofwegen of Carleton.

Queen's small representation was due in large part to injuries, politics, and a tough season. Tailback Brad Elberg and safety Joe Dagnone, both chosen All-Canadians in 1992, missed substantial playing time and were left off this year's All-Star team. However, only politics can explain the omission of classy Gaels' receiver Ed Kidd, who led the OQIFC in receptions with 34 catches for 447 yards. Versatile Rob Weir, who excelled for Queen's as a quarterback, punter, place-kicker, slotback, wide receiver, kick returner, and special teamer, was probably the best utility player in the conference, but couldn't compile enough numbers at any one position to earn selectors' votes.

Women's water polo wet again

BY WALTER POLOUGH
The Queen's Journal

The women's water polo team was back in action this past weekend. With only a quarter of last year's championship team remaining in the ranks, the new Gaels faced an uphill battle at the Carleton Invitational Tourney. Coach Duffey decided to take advantage of this pre-season tournament to expose his army of rookies to their first taste of OWIAA competition and took eighteen players to Ottawa.

The Gaels' first game was against the stronger half of the Ravens' split squad team. Nerves and inexperience surrounded the Gaels first plunge, but luckily team elders Sally P. Reed and Michelle McDonough kept their heads and opened the scoring early for the team. Leanne Wong (back after a year of rest, relaxation, and first year law courses) added one as well to tie the score at 3-3 by the end of the first half. Mental errors and the lack of experience proved too much for the Gaels however, and Carleton cruised to an easy 9-5 win. Jo Hindle and Reed pulled out the only two goals for the Gaels in the second half.

Using his player reserve, Coach Dufferini put a new look Gael team in the water for the second game against Ottawa U. Improving by the minute, the team worked hard to keep the vastly improved GeeGee offense off the scoreboard. Shelly Reed and Jen "the machine" McCrea provided early leadership in the Gaels' own offense as the game pulled even at 5-5 in the third quarter. However, Ottawa let loose with three late goals and won the game 10-7. Roxanne Yong and Sarah "I want to be back in France" Patrick added singles.

Queen's third and final game on Saturday pitted them against Carleton's second team. Playing their best game of the weekend thus far, the Gaels tied the Red Ravens 4-4. Absolutely incredible goaltending by Shoeshine and a late fourth quarter goal by Julie N.I.V. Wood kept the Gaels in the game. Captain Machine and Yong rounded out the scoring.

After a huge feast at the Lone Star (No Ribs??) as well as some cheers and tears for the Blue Jays (Jo doesn't want to talk about it!), the Gaels awoke early on Sunday to face McMaster. Though the teams had last faced each other in a fight for the past season's gold medal, both have been drastically altered by graduating players. Wanting to keep their mastery of Mac alive, Queen's came out fast and furious against the Big Mac Attack. The final score of 13-2 indicated the new Gaels' potential and set them back on the right track. Leading the way for Queen's were the Sallister and E.T. Hindle each with three; McCrea, Wong, and Sheena "I've always wanted my name spelled right" Majewski with two. Rox Yong added the lucky number thirteen.

This set the stage for a re-match with the Ravens' red team for the bronze medal. But, five games in one weekend proved to be a bit much for Queen's young team. Not even a five goal performance by the woman of the weekend, Shelly Reed, could bring about a win for the Gaels. With only two seconds left in the fourth quarter, Carleton scored the final goal of the game to win 9-8. Elbows McCrea added the three remaining Queen's points.

Overall, the weekend was a success for the young Gaels. The Carleton Invitational was an essential learning experience for all members of the team, not only on a skills level but also so the rookies could experience game play and test out the rules (Go Kick-out-Katie!). The team plays next at the Queen's pool on the Nov 13-14 weekend when the Gaels host the first league play of the year. See ya'll there.

Athlete of the week

Sarah Waddock

Congrats to Sarah Waddock! Sarah, a member of Queen's women's field hockey team, is this week's Athlete of the Week. This third-year right winger is being rewarded for her consistent play over the weekend. The Gaels were in Nippan, playing in a tournament hosted by Carleton University. Sarah scored the first goal of the weekend during the match against Western, which ended in a 2-0 victory for us. This victory was a very important one for our women, as it meant fifth versus sixth place in the final standings. The other two scores of the weekend were 0-0 ties versus Guelph and Waterloo. The team travels this weekend to Lanport Stadium, where they will compete in the OWIAA finals, to be hosted by the University of Toronto.

BEWIC Sports Days

BY KATHY JACKSON
The Queen's Journal

For those of you that have been wondering if it's time yet, the answer is finally... YES. That's right, the tradition continues, Bewic Sports Days 1993-94 are on the way. If you weren't here last year, you don't know what you missed, and unless you play this year, you'll never know.

Although it may seem a little premature to be thinking about the month of January, unless you do, you will find yourself missing the event of the year. It may seem like a lot of work to do, but putting together a team is easy, fun and a great way to get to meet and know people in a different environment.

Registration is on Friday, Nov. 5 at the PEC administration office wickets and opens at 9:00 a.m. Team reps should arrive early to register because there is a 32 team limit for the tournament. An early morning line-up is traditional and most spots are usually filled by mid-morning on Friday. Registration forms can be picked up from the Intramural Office in room 201A, from the Bewic bulletin board or at the main entrance of the Phys Ed Centre.

Date: January 21-22, 1994
Time: Friday at noon till Saturday at 10:00 p.m.

Location: Physical Education Centre

Team size: Must have at least 28 people per team consisting of 14 males and 14 females. Teams may be composed of people from various faculties and years.

Team cost: $252 ($9/person) Sports include: Rugby, Basketball (Watch out for those bounces!) Volleyball (Bump, set, over the net!) Innertube Waterpolo (Spish splash!) Broomball (Slip sliding away!)

Team captains' meeting: Tuesday, Jan. 18 at 5:30 p.m. Room 205, PEC.

This marathon intramural event places an extra amount of emphasis on fun (heavy on the fun) and team cohesion, and throws in a little competition on the side. Refs and convenors are on the lookout all weekend long for enthusiasm, sportsmanship, cheers, waves... whatever a team wants to do to demonstrate their team spirit. Awards are given out for this enthusiasm and team spirit, as well as to the individual sport winners and overall champs.

For the first time this year the overall winners will receive the new BSD jacket crest. The weekend wraps up with a pizza banquet on Saturday night when we applaud the efforts of all participants. Remember... be unique, creative and have fun. For more information, contact Laura Zarowny (BEWIC Convenor of Convenors) at the Intramural office.

Calling for convenors...

Sport convenors are an integral part of BEWIC Sports Days. We require two convenors for each of the four sports - volleyball, broomball, innertube waterpolo and rugby basketball. Convenors are responsible for assigning the refs for games (with help) and supervising their sport over the course of the weekend. And don't worry about all work and no play - convenors also get time to participate. If you are interested in convening, please stop by the Intramural office and pick up an application form in the near future. We are trying to get all the convening positions established over the next week or two.

Hockey Gaels Kill McGill

BY TANYA CASEY
The Queen's Journal

The women's varsity hockey team have been practising for the last six weeks in preparation for their upcoming season. The team consists of twelve vets and seven rookies; this combines strength, skill, and confidence.

Returning for their seventh season are coaches Ann (Pepsi) Symes and Di Drury, both team alumnae. With the help of second-year manager Mary Dulmage, the coaching staff are looking forward to a successful year.

On Saturday, while the rest of the Queen's population was watching the football game, the hockey Gaels were travelling to McGill to open their exhibition play. The Gaels outplayed their opponents right from the first drop of the puck. With quick stick-to-stick passes and swift skating the Gaels capitalized on many scoring chances.

At the end of the first period, Queen's was ahead 7-0. The Gaels continued to outplay McGill for the remainder of the game, though with less intensity - final score 8-2.

Goal scorers for Queen's were Stacey Harvey, Julie Walker, Tanya Casey, Shannon Heward, Cori Heaphy, Melanie Hurst, and two by Simone Wilson. Assists were racked by Wendy Gley, Sarah Hurst, Stacey Harvey and Kelly Cheeseman.

Veteran forwards include Tanya Casey, Simone Wilson, Melanie Hurst, Sarah Hurst, and Jill Herbert. Rookie forwards are Catie Clapp, Shannon Heward, Cori Heaphy, Courtney Davis, and Lisa Scott.

The defensive core includes veterans Julie Walker, Stacey Harvey, Wendy Eley and Kelly Cheeseman. The lone new comer to the blue line is Sue Longo. Between the pipes are Catherine Drimmel and Tammy Eger.

Team veteran Melanie Hurst summed up the success of the McGill game as she commented that it was a complete team effort.

The Gaels are back in action on Friday night (tonight) at Jock Hart for another exhibition game against McGill.

Gaels took on the competition in Boston and Montreal

BY CORI KEPPER
The Queen's Journal

Last weekend the crew divided and represented Queen's in both Canada and the United States. Three varsity eights, a lightweight single and a heavyweight double travelled to Boston for four days and competed in the largest and most prestigious regatta this season.

The competition in Boston consisted of crews from all over North America - including Harvard, Yale, Berkeley, McGill and U of T. This particular regatta is truly an international event.

The Queen's heavy men's eight had a guaranteed entry because of their strong performance last season (OUAA champions). The remaining crews gained entry through invitations determined by lottery.

The races occurred on Sunday, but all of the crews began their journey to Boston last Thursday so that they would have time to practice the technically superior course. The Queen's crews in Boston did not miss out on the spirit of alumni weekend; representatives of the Queen's alumni association in New York went to Boston to support the crews on race day.

At press time, the race results of the men's heavy eight and the small boats remain unknown. The men's lightweight eight placed eighth despite an oar-war with another crew.

The other regatta was at McGill. It was held in the Olympic basin and was the season finale for the varsity development (vd) crews. The heavy men's v.d. eight and the heavy men's v.d. four had their best races of the season, placing second.

The eight had a spectacular finish pulling through several crews.

The lightweight men's v.d. crews have had a very consistent and satisfying season. In the four race they placed third, and in the eight they unfortunately did not finish but had a memorable race.

Both women's v.d. eights had strong heats: the A boat had a well deserved second place finish in the final and the B boat placed fifth.

The heavy women's varsity eight were inched out of first place by Trent. The varsity heavy men's four also placed second, losing to Trent. Finally, the lightweight varsity men's four battled their way to third in rough water.

This weekend, the varsity crews head to St. Catharines for the Ontario Championships.

Cito gets no respect

The Jays performed their Amazing repeat despite losing 12 players from their 1992 World Series team. This achievement was a first in baseball history. And Cito Gaston STILL wins NEITHER the baseball writers' NOR the managers' "Manager of the Year" awards! No respect! Is this racist voting by the writers? Are the managers still ticked off because seven Jays made the All-Star team? Or do both groups figure the Jays should win because their line-up is so great?

Pitching? One could almost say, "Who needs it?" The Atlanta Braves and the Chicago White Sox would nearly have to agree, since both teams led their leagues in pitching by wide margins, had potent offenses, yet still were playoff losers.

The Braves, who won 39 of their last 50, and 104 games overall to finish one game ahead of the San Francisco Giants, will have to find a way to win more games early in the season, so they won't be Tomahawk Chopped out of the playoffs. This space said the Braves would win 105 games and the World Series. It also said the Montreal Expos would win 93 games and the National League East. Well, the 'Spos won 94 but finished three back of the worst-to-first Phillies, who hadn't had a winning season since 1986.

Now that Toronto is the first team since 1978 to repeat as World Series champions, Jays' fans should relish the moment, because it is all too rare. How tough is it to win the World Series? Well, Chicago fans have been waiting for 76 years for a Series winner, and that city has two teams! The White Sox haven't won since 1917, and Boston fans have been waiting since 1918 for the Red Sox. Even the Phillies have only won once, and they've played for over 100 years.

Figure it all out? Might as well not even try! You can't explain baseball, which is what makes it so great. Just enjoy it!

Ultimate Championships

This weekend Queen's will be hosting the 2nd annual Eastern Canadian University Ultimate Championships, and at least ten universities are expected to compete with co-ed teams.

Ultimate frisbee is one of Canada's newest and fastest growing sports. It is a high-intensity, non-contact sport played with a flying disc. Feel free to turn up and cheer on the Queen's teams (one of which won last year's tournament) at the west campus field on Saturday and Sunday afternoons.

Me, Mom, and

Me Mom and Morgentaler with Friends of Stu

Alfie's Pub
BY SARAH ENGLISH
The Queen's Journal

Wednesday band night at Alfie's is slowly becoming tradition, and with Wednesday night's show being a Kingston AIDS project benefit, what better method of procrastination could be thought of?

Friends of Stu are a band who have been around the Kingston area for far longer than I have, and have garnered a fairly respectable number of fans. Unfortunately, the first opportunity I had to check them out left me with a rather bad taste in my mouth. Their overly silly antics and ridiculous gimmick costumes made me guffaw several times, out loud even. My expectations were not that high, needless to say, as the band took the stage.

Improvement was an understatement. Trimming down to a slender four members, Friends of Stu have retained their huge band sound. Although I am generally wary of bands which include keyboards, I found myself admitting some of their merits. The band's funky, boppy sound was catchy and their lyrics were good enough to provoke a spontaneous chuckle.

Friends of Stu's theme-song stuck out as memorable, particularly since the main lyric was repeated about fifty times more than necessary, just enough times to engrain it into the brain and as yet mellow crowd. The rather bland lyrics were made up for by the infectious melody and well-executed harmonies.

Another song worth mention was "Bongo." Much like their theme-song, this tune was full of hooks and beats to keep your head in motion. Unfortunately, the only decipherable word was "bongo" and it was difficult to tell what the song was really about. This really didn't matter, however, since it was more fun trying to guess the lyrics than being bored knowing them.

The lack of bizarre costumes was welcome, but the band's enthusiasm as well as their clothing taste seemed to have waned. All the band members assumed a rather bored expression for the entire first half of their set. As the set wore on and the crowd increased, their attitudes also seemed to improve, making for a better time.

After a short break during which a violent debate over the merits of American versus British music broke out at our table, Me, Mom, and Morgentaler took over the stage and appeased us all, proving Canadian music tops it all.

Me, Mom... have been entertaining us all for quite a while now. This statement is not all that revolutionary, but when one takes into the "flash-in-the-pan," "flavour of the month" reviews they received upon the release of their first album, Me, Mom... deserve a lot of credit. True, the last leg of touring before Shiva Space Machine was released tended to become rather repetitive and, well, dull. Boring now? Not quite! Reggae, funk, ska, rock... the band mixes it all into a melting pot of energy and joy.

Refusing to play until the dance floor was nearly full, they began the set with familiar material. Me, Mom... played the songs with an intensity that made the songs fresh and interesting. Their hit, "Oh, well" which can be found backmasked at the end of their had the now fairly dense crowd ready to rock. After the extremely happy "Anarchie" (sung entirely in French), the band whizzed into their first "latino fiesta," "Negrita." By now, the mixed crowd on the dance floor were going crazy.

There's always time to make fun of the people who are determined to play pool at live shows, and Wednesday was no exception. After harassing the people holding sticks and looking cool, "Welcome to my House" was kindly dedicated to openers Friends of Stu. The song showcased the individual talents of the band members, and included incredible accordion harmonies, and horns from heaven. Particularly impressive was the exuberance given off by the band. Each member seemed to be laughing with the audience, rather than at the audience, as many bands who have played Alfie's in the past have been prone to do (cf. The Wonder Stuff, 1991).

"Everybody's Got AIDS" was the band's chance to show their support for Kingston's AIDS project. Breaking for a good five minutes, the lead singer explained the meaning of the song, that AIDS is a problem that affects everyone, and we all need to take a part in working towards a cure. Dragging a student onto the stage, he proceeded to question her on AIDS and its implications while condoms were handed out to the crowd members. Eventually, after laughing at a crowd member obviously impatient to continue the song, the band obligingly finished the tune and launched onwards.

The second "latino fiesta," "Peppita," was a romping party which followed the empowerment of women track, "Master of the Universe." Although Me, Mom and Morgentaler are a strange looking, with a bizarre sounding barrage of sounds, they manage to pull off political songs with credibility.

A person at the next table joked about what a farce the

Ani DiFranco: mixing pop and politics

Yvonne Roche Johnson

Delightfully difranco

Ani DiFranco
K.C.V.I. Auditorium
BY TARA HILLIS
The Queen's Journal

Ani DiFranco blew through Kingston last Tuesday evening leaving infatuated fans in her dust. Rumour has it that there are pockets of her admirers in every North American city — and beyond.

The crowd of about 150 were in a good mood. After a few songs people started getting up and dancing at the sides of the auditorium and the number of dancers grew as the evening wore on.

Difranco's music is frequently characterized with words like "political," "upbeat" and "folky," but these words fail to capture her unique style, personality and incredible musical abilities. Long-time fans have watched her guitar-playing prowess progress from average to the impressive intricate rhythms she is now playing. There is something in her music for everyone: it is not just for folksy types or people who like their politics.

She didn't pick up her guitar until the second song, electing to begin the show with the title track from her second CD, Not So Soft, played against the background of a bongo drum. The second song expressed the theme for the evening — new and unrecorded music. I got the feeling that I was listening to her new and yet to be recorded CD.

"Pick yer nose," a tune from the latest release, Puddle Dive, drew rousing applause (perhaps an indication of the personal habits of some of the crowd). The audience was most receptive to the songs that were previously recorded, dancing to "Every state line," or "In and out" and "What if no one's watching" (my personal favourites), all from her third CD, Imperfectly.

The second song of the second set introduced a role reversal. Andy the drummer and person with whom she shared the stage, inherited the guitar and lead vocals for his song "Pass the wheel," while ani assumed the role of drummer.

Difranco's music is powerful both lyrically and rhythmically. The songs, most of which are derived from ani's life experiences, express intense and varied emotions, seducing the listener to share her anger, passion and laughter. The music is as broad as it is deep, showing off her unique singing style and wide range of vocal abilities. Although, she did not seem to be using her voice to its full capacity because of a throat infection, the many textures of her voice were expressive.

When she sings, I'm invincible and so are you... you get the feeling that she is right, at least about herself. She courageously shared herself with the audience and played to them as well as for them. Many comments and songs were tailored for the crowd and she took a special interest in making sure the music was conducive to dancing.

From watching ani on stage, one gets the idea that she could carry the show on personality alone, something she had to do at a couple points as she redressed equipment difficulties associated with playing in a high school auditorium.

She jokingly suggested that she be introduced as being hot off a Tanzanian tour. There is a grain of truth underlying the joke. ani tours endlessly across North America and sometimes Europe, a lifestyle that would exhaust anyone. Her stop in Kingston was in between shows in Ottawa and Montreal. She seemed tired and ready for a break.

It seemed appropriate that the evening ended with "Anticipate," a song from Not So Soft, trailing off with the lyrics if there is anything I've learned in all these years on my own it's how to find my own way there and how to find my own way back home. Hopefully, she'll find her way back to Kingston soon.

The domestication of the Twins

But hey, it's still a great Cocteau party

The Cocteau Twins
Four-Calendar Cafe
Fontana
BY ANDREW MCALLISTER
The Queen's Journal

From their first release in 1983, entitled Garlands, the British music press has treated the Cocteau Twins poorly by showering them with unending, indeed often embarrassing, praise. In 1985, Steve Sutherland of Melody Maker dubbed them "the Voice of God." Interviewing the band proved impossible: they turned columnists to stone. One over-confident New Music Express columnist spent seven hours with vocalist Elizabeth Fraser in the hopes that she would offer up her darkest secrets on a platter. No such offerings were forthcoming. Noted Elizabeth, "He completely fucked himself up." Equally intransigent band member Simon Raymonde proclaimed that "there are no big questions and there are no big answers." As a result, the reviews of their material have been interspersed with seemingly irrelevant and frothy anecdotes. The music itself used to consist of instrumentals with vocal sounds, but this is changing.

Heaven or Las Vegas, the band's 1990 release, marked their last full album on the 4AD label, ending a somewhat less than harmonious relationship. Four-Calendar Cafe is their first release on the major Polygram/Fontana label, ensuring wide-scale distribution for the album (it's even in Kingston!). The new material is a distinct break from their traditional "calligraphy and reverb" formula. The Cocteaus are aging. With the arrival of Robin Guthrie and Fraser's daughter Lucy, a certain responsibility and stability has entered their lives. Their increasingly domestic lifestyle is changing their music, and the cosmetic and sonic changes on Four-Calendar Cafe reflect this.

The label change resulted in the severance of the band's relationship with designer Paul West, who was responsible for the often euphoric artwork on the previous two records. The designs seemed fitting for such an enigmatic trio. The cover of the new release presents a collection of objects befitting one's knickknack junk drawer at home — the meaning of which manifests itself in Liz and Robin's increasingly domestic lifestyle. Absent is the distinctive calligraphy of the Cocteau Twins' logo.

The original purity of the group has been preserved with Robin Guthrie, Elizabeth Fraser and Simon Raymonde writing and producing all of the music at Robin's September Sound studios. Since Heaven or Las Vegas, Guthrie has produced Chapterhouse and Lush, which is rather ironic as those two groups owe much to the groundwork for the British shoegazing scene laid by the Cocteau Twins. Nonetheless, the studio time has sharpened Robin's skills, and the once very obvious cathedral-like reverberation has been trimmed to produce what sounds like a very tight, clean recording. The guitars of Ben Blakeman and Mitsuo Tate both have graced the album with interesting effect. Gone is the up-front chorus of feedback from Guthrie, replaced by a far more conventional playing style on most tracks. I shuddered to hear the influence of country music on "Bluebeard" in the form of a slide guitar. Furthermore, Elizabeth Fraser's vocals are very audible. What?! Part of their charm was that you couldn't tell what Liz was going on about.

There is something here for every Cocteau Twins fan. The strongest track on Four-Calendar Cafe is a beautiful non-stop shimmer of guitars from beginning to end called "Squeeze-Wax." Liz's euphoric voice chants You amaze me in a song full of wonder and fascination about her daughter. "Summerhead" marks the return of Guthrie's obnoxiously loud guitar, with Liz hitting those glass-breaking notes reminiscent of "Aikea-Guinea."

It is not all blissful in content. As Liz commented on the moody track, "Theft, and wandering around lost," in a recent Melody Maker, "I don't know what's happening here. I'm getting paranoid."

Four-Calendar Cafe does have its problems. The vocals on some of the tracks, such as "Essence," are just too discernible, taking some of the magic out of the music. The song names are somewhat representational, a regression from such great titles as "Ella Megalust Burls Forever."

Overall, this release is a logical follow-up to Heaven or Las Vegas, having many similar stylistic elements. The band's music has always been somewhat visual, and even more so with Four-Calendar Cafe. Guthrie's battery of effects have done wonders in producing lush, sweeping, pleasing textures. It struck me that it sounded like a film soundtrack.

The question to be asked is how long can the Cocteau Twins continue along the same artistic path before they come to the essence of music, and thus a unified homogeneous sound? I didn't want them to put out more material. Heaven or Las Vegas did it for me. Nevertheless, I have to admit that Four-Calendar Cafe really rocks. It is the ideal companion to that shelf full of The Sundays, The Cranberries and Lush. Sing it Liz.

Beautiful, yes, but is it Art?

Kingston Symphony Association
The Grand Theatre
BY RUSSELL VANCE
The Queen's Journal

Looking as if he had materialized from the pages of the latest GO, the dashing cellist John Friesen took the stage of the Grand Theatre last Sunday as part of the Kingston Symphony's Masterworks Series.

I must admit that I am always sceptical of good-looking performers, as it seems to me that only genuinely repulsive artists can be respected solely for their art. If a good-looking performer also happens to be extremely young, then I am doubly sceptical. Classical music critics, often the harshest and most exacting group of critics an artist can have the bad fortune of encountering, seem inexplicably to lose all judgment in the presence of a young performer. It is as if a musician's age somehow excuses them from playing good music.

To be fair, I should also add that I am a cellist myself, frustrated by years of losing music competitions to so-called "prodigies" that also (remarkably) happened to be far cuter in a bow-tie than I will ever be. Equally, I am jaded by the success of carefully-marketed, but clearly second rate, cellists such as Ofra 'awful' Harnoy (whose nauseating album covers usually feature her striking some dreamy, far-away pose with her cello).

Therefore, as I leafed through the program prior to the concert, John Friesen's boyishly charming photograph aroused tremendous animosity in me as the music-going public again going to be duped by their Dorian Grey-esque infatuation with youth?

Perhaps. But the simple fact is that John Friesen is a talented cellist, who has clearly spent intense energy on perfecting the technical aspects of his art. The opening bars of his first work (Saint-Saens' Cello Concerto No. 1) are notoriously difficult to control, yet were managed with daring sophistication and poise. In fact, the entire Saint-Saens' Concerto is exposed, with the orchestra rarely providing cover during difficult technical passages. Friesen's left hand moved effortlessly over the entire fingerboard at incredible speed, covering (what I know to be) extremely difficult chord progressions without appearing hasty.

Similar technical verve was demonstrated in the even more challenging Variations on a Theme Rocco, by Tchaikovsky. The coda that concludes the Variations stymied my attempts to learn it for over a year, and I was therefore incredibly impressed to see it emerge so effortlessly from under Friesen's fingertips.

There are, however, two broad areas that, for now, leave Friesen just short of becoming truly magical. The first is a lack of mental toughness: it was clear in some passages of the Saint-Saens that minor errors disturbed Friesen more than they should have. In one instance, a small mix-up of notes in a decorative turn took the confidence and intensity out of the subsequent phrase. In the Variations, a few intonation errors in the atmospherically high harmonics seemed to throw Friesen's focus, and led to scrambling desperation.

The second, and perhaps most serious, criticism that must be made of Friesen's playing is his lack of attention to his bow. Friesen appears to be overly occupied with "playing notes", and ignores the need for a sweet, lyrical tone. Several dramatic entrances were ruined by a disconcerting crunch, as his bow hit the strings with all the subtlety of a 747.

Nonetheless, Friesen is a tremendously exciting performer who should be watched closely in the coming years. He is impressive not simply for his youth, but for the technical mastery he shows over his art. I would be extremely surprised if he were not offered substantial recording contracts, and critical accolades. In other words, I am jealous as heck.

Nonetheless, Friesen is a tremendously exciting performer who should be watched closely in the coming years. He is impressive not simply for his youth, but for the

A parade worth waiting for

Waiting For The Parade
Written by John Murrell
Directed by Suzanne Andrews
Baby Grand Theatre
BY KATY BITTENBINDER
The Queen's Journal

Waiting for the Parade is a wonderful story that expresses the desires and emotions of five women living through World War II. These women bond together through their common fight against the horrid realities of the war. The play beautifully depicts how people, with the help of others, can survive anything and find a liberating independence within themselves.

Each of the five actresses deserve to be commended for a moving performance. Heather Bonham portrays an elderly woman who retains her strong character, despite the separation that the war has created between herself and her two sons.

An especially strong friendship is evident between the characters played by Susan Hull (Catherine) and Stephanie Baptist (Eve). The scene in which they become intoxicated is especially amusing and performed with "ungraceful" aplomb. Catherine maintains her humour despite her situation as a lonely single mother. The joy she feels with the return of her husband ends the play with a window of hope. Eve's admirable transformation from a woman dependent upon her husband into a capable woman is inspiring to see evolve.

Helen Bretzke's character Marta deals with the difficulty of being isolated from her fellow compatriots because of her father's suspected Nazi ties. The unjust treatment of this woman is emphasized throughout the play, but she ultimately triumphs by being able to see humour in the situations her father could not.

Wendy Kennedy plays Janet, an annoying yet enthusiastic leader who keeps the women singing. She too has the spotlight to discuss her situation as well as share her own moments of laughter and pain.

Waiting for the Parade's strength lies in its characters and how they deal with the challenges of their times. Director Suzanne Andrews, an active member of The People's Theatre, seemed most interested in portraying the realities of this era and utilizes the script to convey many of the difficulties facing women in this time period. After talking to Andrews, it is obvious she is excited about sharing this play with the Kingston community and getting feedback from a modern audience.

The play is being performed in the Baby Grand Theatre, which allows for an intimate ambience and a good seat regardless of where you sit. The lighting and music effectively promote the mood of the play and bring one back into the 1940s, while the set depicts a separate home for each of the women and allows the characters to shine through as the true focus of the play.

Waiting for the Parade runs from October 28 to November 6. For tickets and information call the Grand Theatre 530-2950 or the People's Theatre at 544-2021.

Cyberspace Cadet by Derek Walker Introducing The NET: Soapbox and Netnews

Pissed off? Have a problem? Want to find out when your favourite TV show is on? Or do you desire to communicate with your fellow humans through the salmy veil of electronic mail? Soapbox and NetNews are hi-tech solutions to these dilemmas.

Soapbox is actually the name of a series of discussion groups accessible through the Queen's mainframe. The discussion groups are created and used by all members of the Queen's community and cover a variety of topics. NetNews is the collective name of all the discussion groups available on the Internet (the world-wide computer network). Many of these discussion groups are also accessible through the mainframe.

On Soapbox, a person who wants to discuss a topic starts a new discussion and enters some opening remarks to give other users guidelines. Users interested in the topic will read the introductory comments and offer their own (this is called appending). Others then read the appended comments and comment on them. These comments get tacked on the end of the discussion file for others to read. If the discussion is on an interesting enough topic, the file can become very large very quickly. Popular discussions in recent weeks have included the Surface referendum, the election, the world series, and even a discussion on an article written in our own humble section of The Journal (see side of page). This discussion was prompted by our article of several weeks ago of the same name. I am proud to inform our readers that it is currently one of the largest and most active. At present, there are over a hundred discussions on Soapbox.

Some discussions can get very heated, like one currently active on Surface. Some can be facetious, like discussion group active last year which catered to insomniacs. People appended comments during the wee hours of the morning telling the world about their nocturnal difficulties.

Soapbox is a miniature version of NetNews, which has discussions with worldwide participants. There are thousands of NetNews discussion groups on every subject imaginable, from feminism to fractals, Basketball to Bob Marley and of course a host of technical computer discussions.

This year, undergraduates have been given the ability to post to these groups. So we can all participate in these international discussions.

The groups are organized into categories such as soc for society, comp for computers, alt for alternative, etc. From these main divisions, the discussion groups branch out into more specific discussion areas.

One of the most popular categories is the 'alt' category. Within its folds may be found everything from Nine Inch Nails fan groups to world news, from rave announcements to race relations.

During the gulf war, much of the up to the minute information on the war was being disseminated through these discussion groups (sent directly from computers in the middle east), and proved to be more accurate in many cases than the CNN telecasts. (During the Tiananmen Square Massacre, the only news reports that made it out of China were those posted on the Internet by Chinese students — ed.) Recently, Fermat's last theorem (that is, there are no integers x, y and z that satisfy the equation $x^n + y^n = z^n$ where n is larger than 2; whole branches of mathematics have sprung from the quest for this bit of numerical trivia — ed.) was proved by a British mathematician. This tremendous news (well, tremendous to those in the science and math fields) was immediately posted on the discussions groups and throughout the Internet. It took the newspapers and magazines nearly two weeks to catch up.

As well, NetNews discussion groups are an easy way to find out about conferences or to do preliminary research into a field. A friend who was doing her thesis on the cyberpunk genre simply kept tabs on alt.cyberpunk to find out about conferences, read papers and correspond with others studying the same subject. Since the Internet's primary purpose is to link academic institutions together, a sizable chunk of Internet "traffic" is research data. Whether your field is in the sciences or the humanities, you can access the most current research on your topic through the 'Net.

Get on the 'Net! As we say in the geek business, "if you're not wired, you're tired!"

Next Friday's issue will feature Back Page.

Dial "P" for Privacy: What Soapboxers say

Sure, you may scoff at us geek types (Derek's in Electrical Engineering - Computer Option, Joy's in Computer Science) and our strange way of communicating through cyberspace, but consider this: you'll either be fly to this stuff soon, or you'll be paid to fetch us our coffee. And now, some excerpts:

> Append 0 by XXXX 19931004 14:15:56 15 1lines:01a1 "P" for Privacy

OK, I've been having a few discussions with friends about this for a few days, so I thought I'd throw it open for discussion. Here are the two opposing viewpoints:

Call Display invades the callers privacy because their phone number can be saved and then later used for another purpose. Case in point: a friend of mine called a craft store to find out some information last week. Today, they called back to ask her if there was anything that they could do for her.

Call display protects the privacy of the person who is called. Example: anyone in Kingston can find out my name and telephone number and then call me whenever they want. Is it not fair to allow me the same information when I decide if I want to answer the phone?

Opening Comments by XXXXXX

> Append 1 by XXXX 19931004 16:06:44 7 1lines:...

I don't think any of should be allowed to anonymously phone someone else, and I have no problem with call display. The problem of being called back without permission is merely facilitated by call display.

> Append 5 by XXXX 19931004 17:15:12 15 1lines:...

So it's the way people use this information that is wrong, then, and not the fact that the information is displayed. I have call waiting, and if I see that my friend has called me three times this afternoon and has not left a message on my answering machine, I do NOT call him back. I assume that he just called to chat and there was nothing important. On the other hand, I know 2 friends that have been calling for some political candidates and they are asked not to leave messages on peoples answering machines. So they don't.

One of these people does it from home, and then people get their number and call them, harassing them, asking why they didn't leave a message. This is unfair, but it is the person who abuses the system that is at fault, it is not an invasion of privacy. ... End of Append by XXXXXX

> Append 13 by XXXX 19931005 00:05:06 13 1lines:...

Agreed with jake and the Flying Fireman. Sorry, Jake, my keyboard isn't working well enough to capitalize your name. I got call blocking today... I think my machine does a fine job of answering the phone. Besides, some people are getting really paranoid about Call Display. Seems (I got this straight from Bell) that people actually read the phone book looking for the numbers of people who called that they don't know. Call me pessimistic... it's just Bell's way of trying to make even more money. And I don't think people who don't leave messages on my machine are rude. They probably don't have anything to say! Sign me more than irritated...

Senate reverses sexual assault sentence

Judicial Committee chair questions procedural argument

BY BROCK MARTLAND
The Queen's Journal
Controversy has erupted after a recent University Senate decision reduced the sentence of a male student who admitted to sexually assaulting an unconscious female student. The assault occurred at an all-night party in January, 1993. Twenty-three of 44 senators voted Thursday to lower the sentence recommended by the Alma Mater Society Judicial Committee. The Judicial Committee has the power to discipline students, according to the University Constitution. It is made up of law and undergraduate students. Law School Dean Don Carter, who supported the Senate's motion to lower the sentence, said the decision was one of "procedure, not of substance." However, the current Judicial Committee chair, Kirsti Gronas, disagreed. "It seems to me that they really thought the sanction was too heavy, and they were hiding behind a flimsy procedural argument," she said. The Judicial Committee hearings were held in March, where the accused pleaded guilty. His lawyer and the AMS prosecutor concurred on an agreed statement of facts, and on a joint recommendation for a three-year suspension. However, the Judicial Committee chose to raise this sentence to seven years on the basis that the assault was very serious, and the victim wished to continue her studies at Queen's without fear of the assailant. Carter maintained that "this case involved a plea bargain and an agreed set of facts that was reached between the AMS prosecutor and the lawyer for the accused student. ... The issue before the Senate was whether there was a procedural error in going outside that plea bargain." He said, "we were not there to judge the appropriateness of the penalty, rather the appropriateness of the process." Carter argued that the "normal procedure" for the courts would be that "you can go outside a plea bargain, but you have to have very compelling evidence to do so." In this case, he said, "there wasn't compelling evidence on the record to indicate any justification for going outside the plea bargain." Gronas disagreed with Carter's reading of the agreement between the prosecution and defence. "That was only a recommendation ... I don't like to call it a plea bargain, because I don't see it as that," she said. Although the accused had the right to appeal the Judicial Committee decision to the Senate Grievance Board, Gronas said his choice not to appeal indicated his acceptance of the seven-year sentence. Gronas suggested that Carter "shouldn't come back with an alternative penalty without more details of the sexual assault ... The agreed statement of facts said enough, why should we have to subject the victim to [more detailed questioning]? The rest is just pure sideshow value." Gronas added, "I don't think Don Carter has any hidden agenda, and I certainly wouldn't want to say what his motives were ... He's a very fair man, we just happen to disagree on this issue."

Marriott workers picket Leonard

Worker allegedly fired for "not shaving"

BY RUSSELL VANCE
The Queen's Journal
Monday afternoon saw conflict at Marriott Food Services, as about a dozen workers picketed Leonard Hall Cafeteria to protest the firing of one of Marriott's employees. CUPE Local 229, under which Marriott part-time workers recently organized, staged the half-hour picket in protest of what they allege was the unfair dismissal of Steve Hannah, a part-time dish-washer at Leonard Hall for almost five years. Hannah claims that he was taken into the management office at Leonard Cafeteria after his six-and-a-half-hour shift on Sunday, and was fired. The reasons given, he claims, included the fact he hadn't shaved, and his "unsafe handling of dishes."

Part-time Marriott workers protest firing.

John Platt, president of Local 229, told The Journal that the firing was more likely "an act of intimidation, an attempt to push the union." He noted that part-time workers are about to begin negotiations with Marriott for their first-ever contract. Bruce Dodds, a member of the bargaining unit representing the interests of part-time workers, disagreed, stating that "if [Marriott] is using intimidation tactics it's because they're not very smart. I just think they're just used to getting their way."

"Our belief is that Steve was fired because they simply didn't like him. I didn't shave yesterday, but I wasn't fired," Dodds added. In order to dramatize his disgust with the firing, Dodds shaved his stubble outside Leonard Cafeteria in front of a television crew from CKWS News.

Hannah said he could not understand what was "unsafe" about his handling of dishes, stating that he had not mistreated or broken any. A statement issued by the union said: "We're Steve's co-workers and we think firing him, after almost five years in the dishroom, is unjust and unfair. We're here today to fight it. Firing Steve shows just how little respect Marriott really has for part-time workers."

The picket did not disrupt food service, nor block workers from entering Leonard Hall. The primary purpose of the picket, said Dodds, was to draw attention to the firing, and provide workers with information.

Hannah said he has no other source of income, and was trying to save money from his $6.50 hourly wage so that he could go to school. He said he will now have to sell his truck and go on unemployment insurance.

Hannah voiced his support for the union, saying, "it's good that my fellow workers will help me out if they can." Jim Fougere, Marriott Food Services director at Queen's, watched the picket closely from nearby. He admitted that although he was aware of the firing, the picket had caught him by surprise.

Fougere added he "would like to assure everyone that [the firing] has nothing to do with our attempt to negotiate a contract with our workers." He refused to justify the firing, however, saying only that "I am not at liberty to speak at this time."

Part-time workers will be pressing management in upcoming negotiations for an increase in pay to match full-time workers. Currently, part-time workers are paid $4 to $5 less per hour than full-time workers for the same work. Dodds told The Journal that "equal pay for equal work is a basic premise of our contract campaign."

Surface in limbo

The Queen's Journal
Hold on to your seats, Queen's, Surface isn't officially dead yet, according to the results of an Arts and Science Undergraduate Society special general meeting held last night. Arts and Science students defeated a motion to make the October Surface funding referendum result retroactively binding. The vote was 65-56. However, another motion stating that "all ASUS referenda be binding upon ASUS Assembly," passed by a vote of 50 to 23. ASUS Vice-President Heath Grant told The Journal this second motion wouldn't affect the Surface referendum — it remains non-binding.

But no side supporters Darren Littlejohn and Andrew Dick said they felt the motion should apply to the referendum result. ASUS President Jenn Steeves wouldn't speculate on ASUS's next step, and said Council will meet today to discuss the meeting's results.

Further information was not available at press time.

How to get on SOAPBOX and NETNEWS:

Soapbox
First you have to have a mainframe account. If you don't have one, take a copy of the P.I.N. number issued to you in September to the basement of Jeffrey Hall or Mac-Corry and the advisors there will help you.

Once you have your password you can go to almost any terminal on campus that is hooked into the network and type VM.

Ascreen will pop up with a funky ASCII-art "Q". Type in your user I.D. (which should be something like 4ACK) and press enter. Then type in your password.

Now you are logged onto the mainframe. To run Soapbox, simply type soapbox.

After a few moments a screen will pop up with a list of options. To view existing discussions, hit F5. Use F7 and F8 to page through the discussions. Once you have found a discussion you're interested in, hit F2 to view it. Use F7 and F8 to move back and forth in the file. Pressing F5 again will provide a brief summary of the appends. To add your comments, hit F4 and type your comments in (remember to use the END key, not the ENTER key at the end of your file).

To start a new discussion hit F4 from the list of discussions and follow the instructions on the screen.

To quit Soapbox, hit F3 (Quit) until you see Ready at the top of the screen. To log out, type logout.

Remember to log out when you're done, otherwise other people can use your account!!

Netnews
To get access to NetNews, type ne tnews after you log on. As with Soapbox, use F7 and F8 to page through the list of discussions. If you're interested in a particular topic press F10 (to search) and then type a relevant name to search for.

To view a discussion, move the cursor using the arrow keys to the line that the discussion is on and press F11. Use F7 and F8 to page through the list of appends. When you see something you're interested in, move the cursor to that line and hit F11 again. Hit F3 when you're done.

To send e-mail to the person directly, hit F5. To append to the discussion, type netpost, enter the subject and hit ENTER. Now you can type your comments. To forward your comments to the discussion, hit F5 twice.

Use F3 repeatedly to exit NetNews.

There are more NetNews groups that are accessible through Gopher. To get access to them, type gopher after logging on. Move the cursor to External Information Services and hit ENTER. A new menu will pop up and from this select Comprehensive Netnews in the same fashion.

Although Gopher allows access to many more newsgroups, you cannot post.

FAQs
The methods for accessing newsgroups and posting to them vary from group to group. Some groups will actually let you subscribe to them which means that appends to the discussion are e-mailed directly to you. Once you have found a group you are interested in, look for an append called with the term FAQ in it. This is the Frequently Asked Question file which lists instructions on how to use the group. If you plan on posting to the group, it's usually best to read this file to avoid embarrassing situations (being caught "out of the loop" is a fatal social faux pas in cybercircles).

Fall convocation features Carl Sagan

BY KRISTEN KUNNAS
and THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL STAFF
The Queen's Journal

Queen's 152nd fall convocation took place this past weekend in Grant Hall, with approximately 850 students graduating. The weekend featured the awarding of a number of honorary degrees, including one to scientist Carl Sagan, and 12 special Doctor of Science degrees to outstanding engineers, in recognition of the Faculty of Applied Science's 100th anniversary.

Principal Smith addressed the Friday morning convocation invoking the memory Queen's Principal George Munro Grant, for whom Grant Hall was named.

"Grant pioneered the tradition that Queen's as a modern university had to move with the times — or, as paradoxical as it may sound, a tradition of constant change to keep up with expanding knowledge and meet the needs of a developing nation and world," Smith said.

Smith quoted the 1933 convocation address given by Principal Sir William Hamilton Fyffe.

"Somehow you have got to establish in human society three things that have been hitherto in history incompatible: economic efficiency, social justice and individual liberty. However you may earn your living and whatever success you may win in your profession, you must in large measure devote your intelligence and sympathy to that end or else fail in patriotism."

The last Queen's line-up for recent graduates.

Derek Yarnell

Smith said Fyffe's words were still relevant, especially in today's hard times. "As Yogi Berra would say, 'It's déjà vu all over again,'" Smith said.

Of special interest was the degree granted to Carl Sagan at the Friday afternoon convocation.

Carl Sagan, a Pulitzer Prize winner and prominent scientist, accepted his degree with a particularly interesting speech directed at the graduates Friday afternoon.

"There is an ancient human tradition of teaching and learning.

You and me are just later examples of it," said Sagan. Apparently, Cromagnon humans went to school, a point which Sagan elaborated on.

He explained that there is a tradition, stretching over a million years, with respect to the stone tools humans made. And because of this tradition, "there must have been schools," reflected Sagan.

He humorously depicted a prehistoric graduation ceremony for "stone-chippers" involving "hunting an animal larger than yourself." Sagan said he believes education is essential for the success of humanity, for "we are born with very little knowledge."

In his closing remarks, he urged the graduates to become innovative to meet the demands of a rapidly changing society.

"Your task is to use the knowledge that you have acquired to add to the sum total of human knowledge; to challenge the existing traditions; to innovate and to think clearly. I am confident that you can make the world a better place. It desperately needs improvement."

Alfie's over-exposure incident

Five males to be banned from campus pubs

BY ADAM EMERY
The Queen's Journal

After a month of inaction, the five students who exposed themselves at Alfie's now face a ban from campus pubs until March. In addition, a female off-duty Campus Security officer, who was allegedly seated at the same table as the men, has been suspended without pay and put on probation.

Four weeks ago, The Journal reported that on Oct. 2, five male patrons were spotted at Alfie's sitting at a table with their genitals exposed, and were subsequently asked to leave the bar by a Student Constable.

At the time, both Head Constable Sue Cameron and Director of Security Howard Pearce promised that an investigation would follow.

This week, the Constables, in conjunction with Alfie's Pub, took a number of steps towards resolving this incident. Head Constable Cameron said, "some of the males have been identified. I can't say how many. I have a source who will tell me their names. When we get the rest of their names, all of them will be banned [from campus pubs] until March 1, 1994."

When asked about the fact that it took over a month for a decision to be reached, Cameron expressed dissatisfaction with the cooperation of other parties involved. "It could have gone quicker. It was hard getting information. We played a lot of phone tag with Security. Still, I'm happy with our decision to pursue [the incident] from the Constable end of things," said Cameron.

Cameron's difficulties in obtaining information forced her to employ other means. "The source I'm getting the information from is not Security," said Cameron.

Even though the Constables feel the incident has been resolved, it is possible that the offenders may still have to face disciplinary action from the Alma Mater Society's Judicial Committee, a body responsible for non-academic discipline on campus.

"Their names will be submitted to the Judicial Committee. If [the committee] chooses to pursue it, that's up to them," said Cameron.

Director of Security Howard Pearce, when asked about the nature of the officer's punishment for her involvement in the incident, said, "we have taken very serious disciplinary action against the officer. She's been disciplined for comments that she made."

Pearce said, "during the encounter between the gentlemen who allegedly exposed themselves and the [Student Constable], she made some comments and identified herself as a member of Queen's Security and expressed some opinions."

"[The security officer] has been suspended for a period of time without pay, and a probationary period will follow," said Pearce.

Originally, communication problems between the Constables and Security delayed the resolution of the incident.

When informed last week of Pearce's decision not to pursue action against the five males, Cameron stated, "we were waiting for Security to make a decision. Now that [Security has] decided not to take any action, we can deal with [the situation] ourselves."

Security's non-involvement leaves any form of punishment up to Sue Cameron and the Student Constables, who handled the original incident.

What's in a name?

Applied Science may change name against students' will

BY MICHELLE PELLEGRIN
The Queen's Journal

A rose by any other name would smell as sweet, right? Not if you ask an engineer.

The Faculty Board of Applied Science voted to change the faculty's name to the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, despite the fact that 73 per cent of engineering students voted in a referendum last month to keep the faculty's name as it is — the Faculty of Applied Science.

On Oct. 20, the Faculty Board, consisting of nine student members and 250 faculty members, overruled the students' choice by a 28-27 vote in favour of a name change.

Mark Simpson, president of the Engineering Society, said he "would like to think the Faculty supports students' opinions" and said "we [the students] were disappointed."

Applied Science Dean Carl

Hamacher refused to speak to The Journal.

Simpson said he feels that a "73 per cent majority is an overwhelming number to keep the name the same" and that the 30 per cent turnout of students who voted was "not bad when one considers that voting among students is not that high."

Ryan Matthews, an Applied Science student senator, said, "it's disappointing that our opinion doesn't carry any weight."

Matthews said it wasn't right that this decision was made when the number of students who voted in the referendum outnumbered the number of faculty members on the board who voted.

Simpson said the nine student representatives sitting on the Faculty Board voted in favour of no name change.

The idea of a name change was originally proposed by a professor in the spring of 1992, said Mat-

Volunteers are needed for the Language Support Program. The program, which is run out of the International Centre in the John Deutsch University Centre, is designed for students who have difficulty with conversational English. Volunteer tutors would be asked to meet with Queen's students and community members who have difficulty with spoken and written English. Interested students should call Susan Anderson at the International Centre, 545-2604.

Peace activist Dr. Mary Wynne Ashford will be speaking on Nov. 17 at 7:30 p.m. in the Duncan McArthur auditorium. Ashford served as president of Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War from 1988 to 1990, and was the recipient of the YM/YWCA Peace Medal and the Canadian government's 125th Anniversary of Confederation Medal. She is presently working towards her PhD, studying how education can change attitudes towards violence. This year's MacClement Lecture is entitled: "Lighting a Candle or Burning Out: The Teacher as Activist." All are welcome to attend.

thews, and a committee was subsequently formed, acting as a sub-committee to the Faculty Board.

The intent was to change the name during the faculty's centennial, Matthews said. He added that presently "there is still a lot of red tape."

Simpson admitted the referendum "was a non-binding opinion poll among students."

He said he believed that any majority motion must be passed by a two-thirds majority vote to be fair, and he plans to meet with Dean Hamacher next week to discuss an appeal or a re-vote.

Castle donor speaks

BY DENNIS PAO
The Queen's Journal

On Monday night, Alfred Bader, alumnus and generous benefactor of Queen's, spoke to a group of faculty, friends and students in Dunning Auditorium in a lecture entitled, "On the Unimportance of a Liberal Arts Education." It was the second in a series of four lectures which Bader gave on Monday and Tuesday.

Most Queen's students will recognize Bader as the person who, along with his wife Isabel, recently donated funds to allow the university to purchase and use Herstoncoeur Castle in England. Queen's new International Study Centre at the castle is scheduled to offer its first program in September 1994.

A Holocaust survivor, Bader escaped to Britain but came to Canada as a prisoner of war because the British thought he was a Nazi para-trooper. After being released from the Canadian POW camp, he attended Queen's, receiving three degrees within the span of three years. He received his PhD from Harvard and became a very successful business leader.

Bader's talk linked many aspects of life to the idea of a liberal arts education, which he said prepares a person for success.

"Liberal arts is totally unimportant unless you want to succeed in life and enjoy life and live life to the fullest," he said.

Bader touched briefly on the logistics behind the sale of Herstoncoeur Castle, and explained why he decided to give so generously to his alma mater.

"When I came out of the POW camp," he said, "I applied to McGill and Toronto and they wouldn't admit me," adding that they denied him because he was Jewish. "But Queen's accepted me."

He went on to talk about business in North America and highlighted the importance that business people put on image, the emphasis on the bottom line in the next quarter, and the "defecation" of corporate executives, as fundamental flaws in corporate America.

Bader emphasized the importance of religion in life. He quoted several of his favourite passages from the Bible to illustrate his point. "If the word [of the Bible] is close to your mind and heart, then you will do as it says," he said.

His final point was a criticism of those who allow themselves to adopt evil practices. "I don't believe that you can pick out the truly evil people in the world," he said. He mentioned that many of his Nazi tormentors were evil because "they were unimaginative. They could not imagine themselves in the shoes of their victims."

Bader said only through a liberal arts education can a person understand religion, and avoid the pitfalls of American business people and evil individuals. Without a liberal arts education, "you will also miss a great deal of fun," he added.

Bader is currently working on an autobiography.

Grey House conflict

BY BRAD ELDER
The Queen's Journal

Internal strife at 51 Queen's Crescent has resulted in charges of harassment against a Grey House coordinator and calls for the disbanding of the Queen's Student and Community Services Group (QSCSG).

At a meeting of the QSCSG Board on Monday night, Mary Syrett, the treasurer for the Queen's Women's Centre in the Grey House, accused QSCSG coordinator Julia Lipinska of harassment.

In addition, a document circulated by Syrett suggests that due to conflict of interest in the Grey House, the QSCSG has become a "pronounced hostile power hierarchy," and should be eliminated.

The QSCSG consists of members from the Birth Control Centre, Telephone Aid Line Kingston (TALK), the Lesbian and Gay Association and the Women's Centre.

According to a letter written by Syrett, Julia Lipinska "verbally harassed Mary Syrett and Bobbi Spark, (both present as representatives of the Women's Centre) individually, and also harassed the Women's Centre as a group" at a board meeting on Sept. 28, 1993.

Syrett said that she will be making a harassment complaint with the Queen's Human Rights Office against Julia Lipinska.

Syrett's letter says that Lipinska accused both Syrett and Spark of having defaced a poster advertising an LGA event. This is as "an act of anti-feminist harassment against the Women's Centre," Syrett wrote.

In a statement, Lipinska said, "It is regrettable that Mary Syrett has chosen to handle this situation in the way I apologized to the two individuals involved at the Nov. 4 QSCSG board meeting. My apologies and remorse are sincere and heartfelt."

Lipinska expressed concern that Syrett did not consult other QSCSG member groups prior to formulating her memo and distributed the memo only minutes before the Nov. 4 board meeting.

Lipinska also voiced her regret over Monday night's meeting.

"I wish to apologize," she said. "It was a situation handled horribly by me... and I regret answering the question put to me [concerning who had defaced the poster], especially since I didn't have concrete evidence."

However, Syrett was not receptive to this apology.

"This is not something that can be swept away by an apology," she replied. "[Lipinska's] act of harassment was incredibly damaging to me, to Bobbi Spark, and to the Women's Centre."

Lipinska told the group that she realizes that as a result of the incident a "strain has been placed on the relationship between the Women's Centre and the QSCSG and I hope that doesn't get worse."

But if Syrett has her way, that relationship may soon come to an end.

Syrett said that conflict of interest is "intrinsic, structured into the QSCSG."

She said that having TALK, the birth control centre, the LGA, and the Women's Centre under one umbrella is "a set-up for a dog-fight... an abusive dynamic."

She complained that groups within the QSCSG have "cannibalized" the group's non-optoutable $2.25 AMS student interest fee. At the point where the Women's Centre receives less than $0.25.

She also cited unequal voting powers on the board and "hostile monitoring" as reasons that the QSCSG is detrimental to the Women's Centre.

QSCSG board members agreed to examine Syrett's concerns at a special meeting on Nov. 17th.

Syrett requested that the Office of Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations) Tom Williams initiate a procedural review into the QSCSG, and "seriously consider" eliminating the QSCSG as an official body in the University since it has been seen to do more harm than good for women.

However, Vice-Principal Williams told The Journal that he would be writing to Syrett to indicate that "as far as I'm concerned, the QSCSG is an AMS creature... I have no jurisdiction."

Edward Said speaks at Queen's

Overflow crowd attends Dunning lecture

BY IAN PETRIE
The Queen's Journal

Edward Said, esteemed professor of comparative literature at Columbia University, gave the 1993 Dunning Trust Lecture, entitled "Historical Experience and Multiculturalism," on Wednesday evening before a capacity audience in Dunning Auditorium.

The attentive crowd, comprised of students, faculty and other members of the Kingston community, filled the aisles and even spilled onto the stage before Said began to speak.

Said attempted to address the on-going debate taking place on North American and British campuses, concerning the incorporation of other cultures — in terms of both ethnicity and sex — into existing curricula, specifically the canon of literature.

Casting the wide net of references familiar to readers of his works, Said argued that in formalism, the dominant trend of twentieth-century literary scholarship, "the wish to escape from experience is very central."

This tendency, he noted, has the effect of turning an author's powerful phrase into "an insignificant semiotic bit," while "the lived experiences... are alchemically transmuted into a slender form, and a European one at that."

Only in recent years, suggested Said, has this hegemonic view of texts been challenged by feminist and ethnic critiques. He invoked recent Nobel Prize winner Toni Morrison to suggest that rather than the "culture of complaint" depicted by conservative commentators, multicultural arguments comprise "persuasive and elegant arguments for... re-narrating crucial historical experiences."

A critique such as Morrison's, noted Said, "does not include an attack on literature as literature." The multicultural voices are, for the most part, "trying to make a place in the world's culture for new, once suppressed, realities," he said, and do not represent nativism or reverse racism.

The failure of many observers to recognize this simply reflects "the impoverishing terms of the debate on the canon." Said argued. Their "polemics have all too often obscured the wellspring of hope from which such approaches derive," he said.

Said, a Christian Palestinian, emphatically denied that individuals should be granted "insider status" on account of their ethnicity or sex.

"When such notions of insider privileges are advanced, they have to be rejected out of hand as perpetuations of the exclusiveness one has always opposed," he said.

Said maintained that all cultures are heterogeneous and hybrid, quoting a moving poem by Paris-educated Antillean Aimé Césaire: "no race has a monopoly on beauty, on intelligence, on strength / and there is room for everyone at the convocation of conquest."

In conclusion, Said stressed that, in the on-going struggle of world peoples for liberation, historical experience remains an essential antidote to the large-scale machinations of culture and power, which threaten to overwhelm the individual.

"By definition, experience is something to which everyone can have access by virtue of being human. The real question is how do we read or study with the notion of historical experience at the centre?"

Five minutes with Said

Ian Petrie was fortunate enough to briefly interview Edward Said during his recent visit to campus. The following are excerpts from their conversation.

Q: One author has suggested that what makes Western civilization unique, in the West's eyes, is its universal applicability. Do you observe this phenomenon as well?

ES: I think one of the problems here is that there's this new sense of triumphalism, that the rest of the world is falling into disrepair.

Q: Francis Fukuyama's The End of History?

ES: Yes. But the West has survived history and has gone beyond history. I think this is one of the most pernicious documents, in terms of hubris and historical inaccuracy. It's based obviously on a huge ignorance of what took place in other civilizations at what time.

It produces quite remarkable caricatures of the idea of some afrocentrists who believe that everything came out of Africa, the Africans invented science and so on. I think that kind of discourse, about one's own society or civilization or nationality, is to be banned permanently.

Q: It has been suggested that enmity between much of the West and the Islamic world is the product of mutual ignorance — the two are like Arnold's "ignorant armies [that] clash by night."

ES: I think what passes for knowledge of the Other is really a kind of tremendous pastiche of knowledge, a combination of marvel, hearsay and pure myth. To try to understand another civilization, much less to understand one's own, is truly a lifetime's work. And what is alarming is the extent to which systems of thought are built out of this very flimsy material. Nothing to my mind could be more dramatic, even today, than what a lot of Western scholars and intellectuals believe Islam is. And it's so far from anything like the lived reality that it really is a form of ideology and not knowledge.

Q: Your sometime collaborator Christopher Hitchens has observed that, paradoxically, the "culture of euphemism" created by the political correctness movement has, in the hands of politicians, actually been used to maintain the status quo.

ES: They deserve each other. The idea that there is a correct way of speaking has, at least on the campus, produced a kind of mindlessness where intellectual standards, discovery and discussion are curtailed. But I must say, it's been tremendously overstated by people like [Dinesh] D'Souza and others, and even Christopher Hitchens... these are people who don't live in the university and don't understand that the life at a university is actually quite salubrious, even in its corrupt forms.

Q: Is it possible to reconcile the gulf between many American academic voices and popular state actions such as last June's bombing of Baghdad? In our society do universities actually serve to contain and neutralize dissent?

ES: The idea is to try to write in such a way as to reach larger audiences... I don't really think it's possible for me, at my age, to try and agitate politically. I think the best thing to do is to command an audience if possible, to communicate with them, to try to counteract some of the mythologies. It's a very slow and uphill process. The media's against you, and the outlets that are available to you have actually been dropping. It's very hard to do. But I think you have no choice but to try.

Edward Said, professor of comparative literature at Columbia University, gave the 1993 Dunning Trust Lecture, entitled "Historical Experience and Multiculturalism," on Wednesday evening before a capacity audience in Dunning Auditorium.

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY AMS
STUDENT SOCIETY

Child care and Assisive Listening Systems will be available

BY BROCK MARTLAND
The Queen's Journal

Thursday night's Alma Mater Society Assembly was host to surprising drama, as commissioners criticized the AMS executive for a lack of support. Besides this issue, discussion centred on childcare and the food services contract committee.

Commissioners revolt

As reported in Friday's Journal, three commissioners used their speaking time to criticize the AMS executive for a lack of support.

Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell said it was misleading to attribute the street party to homecoming rather than the Blue Jays victory, and said the party "sets a dangerous precedent."

Mitchell said the AMS Alumni Weekend organizers lacked support, as three people carried the bulk of the work, setting up the sidewalk sale, answering phone lines, and cleaning up the ghetto on Sunday. The executive's attitude, Mitchell said, was to "come by with a six-pack and ask to help... This is not enough. [The executive] must attend as many events as possible."

Mitchell said she was "sorry to do this in public," but there was "a lack of support from the beginning." She further criticized AMS members whose attitude was "get drunk, it's homecoming," saying their attitude "was at cross-purposes" to her efforts.

Academic Affairs Commissioner Taz Pirmohamed echoed Mitchell's concerns about the executive. Pirmohamed said she's "received almost nothing" in the way of executive support, and "what I have is too little too late."

In the same vein, Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin told Assembly, "I was going to offer this body my resignation... I like my job, I dislike my work environment."

In discussion period, President Katherine Philips said, "rebuttal isn't something I want to do here and now." She said that the restructuring of the AMS should "lead to something better for years to come."

Todd Minerson, vice-president (university affairs), said the past executive "wamed me that this is exactly what I'd face, and a lot of these criticisms were legitimate." Minerson said he perceived the problem as structural rather than personal, and said "hopefully this re-engineering [of the AMS] will take into account a number of these things."

Pirmohamed said that while the difficulties are partly structural, "it isn't all of the problem... It's a function of not structure but lack of responsibility, in some cases, that the executive has demonstrated."

Main Campus Residents Council President Warren Flannery and Concurrent Education President Pete Stuart suggested the executive seek out a third party to mediate, and offer a dispute-resolution mechanism. Philips said she thought "a third-party mediator would be very effective."

Childcare centre questioned
Micheal Camegie, an Arts and Science Undergraduate Society representative, asked what was being done with childcare on campus.

In response, Minerson said the centre was opening Monday, as "a place on campus where parents can bring their children." While not an actual daycare, Minerson said, the centre "will help some parents on campus."

Philips added that, "we have no ongoing funding sources, but I agree that it should be a priority."

Student input for food services contract

Main Campus Residents Council Vice-President (Operations) Blair Bertrand, referring to the food services contract process, said, "we're not feeling very good about being excluded from the process."

To deal with this concern, Rector David Baar forwarded a motion. The motion demanded that half of the food services contract committee be students. It was passed.

Business matters

Assembly approved Sam Chan's proposal to launch a Chinese-language publication at Queen's, to be entitled Empress. The publication will be a forum for current affairs and the exchange of ideas.

Urszula Tomczak's request for AMS to approve the Queen's Polish Student Association Constitution was similarly granted.

Of note...

Commerce Society president John Wilkin said the move to privatize Queen's MBA program is "farsighted" and "generally good."

MCRC Vice-President Blair Bertrand complained that McGill merchandise should not have been sold at the homecoming sidewalk sale.

Pirmohamed questioned Clark Hall posters which read "Do It Doggy-Style," and Publishing and Copy Centre posters which showed a person smoking a joint. The AMS "should try to be a little more creative with our advertising," she said.

Assembly humour
Rector David Baar asked Alison Mitchell whether special amendments could be added to the Model Parliament Mission Statement, "to make it more fun for young Conservatives."

Baar also mocked Con Ed President Pete Stuart's eclectic choice of clothes.

This Assembly likely marked the first use of the words "Yippee" and "Yatzee," according to Speaker Chris Doering.

OUSA passes at Western and Brock

BY TANIS ROBINSON
The Queen's Journal

Membership in the Ontario Undergraduate Students' Alliance is solidifying and expanding as Western and Brock Universities officially ratified their membership in the student lobbying organization, which Queen's helped to found.

Meanwhile, McMaster students will soon be voting on whether to remain a member of OUSA's rival organization, the Ontario Federation of Students.

In a referendum held Oct. 19 to 22, 1,025 Brock students voted 80 per cent in favour of remaining members of OUSA.

"There wasn't a real, organized No side," said Brock Students Union President Mike Zywicki. He said Brock's student newspaper, the Brock Press, covered the No side while the Students' Union generated support for the Yes side.

"Part of the student fees will be funding OUSA," Zywicki said. "We can afford to take it out of our operating budget."

Western's University Students Council voted Oct. 29 to become a member of OUSA. Their voting question also included a provision that "the Council [approve] expenditure up to $6,000 as the University Students Council's contribution to the operating costs during its current fiscal year," and "the collection of $0.95 per undergraduate student for OUSA membership."

"It was passed by council by a fairly large margin after quite a lot of debate," said USC Vice-President (Student Issues) Paul Craven.

USC President Mike Burns added, "it's the right time to join... We certainly want to be part of an effective lobby group, and OUSA can provide that."

Queen's Academic Affairs Commissioner Taz Pirmohamed was pleased with both results. "It was really encouraging for our organization to have more support from other schools," she said. "It solidified the membership of the organization."

Queen's pulled out of the Ontario Federation of Students in 1991 and voted to support OUSA with a 95 cent student interest fee in a referendum last month.

Other OUSA members include Waterloo, Laurier, and the part-time students association at the University of Toronto.

Jason Hunt, president of McMaster's Student Union, expressed the hope that his school would stay in OFS. He said that since there was going to be a vote at the end of the month on increasing student fees anyway, the Students Union decided to include the question of whether to stay in the OFS on the same ballot.

"There isn't much question of Mac, as one of the founding schools, pulling out," he said.

Queen's Indian Students Association raised over $2,000 for earthquake relief in India.

Taking a stand over land

BY BRETT HOUSE
The Queen's Journal

A group of Queen's students are working to make all students property owners — with a twist.

Members of the Ontario Student Land Trust are raising money to purchase environmentally-sensitive lands near Peterborough, Ottawa and Kingston.

The group hopes part of the land will be preserved in its natural state. The rest will be used for environmental education, permaculture experiments, and recreational uses such as camping.

OSLT was formed in 1992 by students from Queen's and other Ontario universities. Its goal is to preserve biological diversity through the purchase and conservation of ecologically-significant lands near universities throughout Ontario.

"We're frustrated by the rapid development of ecologically-sensitive lands near the universities where many of us are studying sustainable development and ecology issues," noted Kara Mitchell, a fourth-year geography student and a facilitator for the OSLT.

"If no one else is going to protect important natural areas in Ontario, we think students should take the initiative. We want to start applying some of the things we're learning," Mitchell said.

Kevin O'Callaghan, a fourth-year history student and OSLT facilitator, said, "too often the developing nations are targeted for conservation. Conservation has to start at home."

"Communally-owned land will be a lasting symbol of students' commitment to protection because of their recent support and research at the university," the OFS has had a high profile on campus lately."

Pirmohamed said that McMaster voting on whether or not to pull out of OFS is evidence that "more and more students are not identifying with the policies of the OFS."

"OUSA will be moving forward as a very strong force in the student movement in the next few years," she said.

fecting the environment," O'Callaghan said. "It's a cultural experiment as well as a biological project. We want to find new ways of working together to use the land sustainably."

Mitchell added that "the world is a rapidly changing place and our education needs to help us respond to the ecological and social problems facing us."

"The lands will be a focus for helping students educate themselves on growing food sustainably, making their lives more environmentally friendly, and they will allow students to have some fun in the environment we're trying to protect," she said.

"We're also hoping the lands will create employment and research opportunities for students," enthused Mitchell. "We eventually want to provide a model alternative to traditional careers and lifestyles."

O'Callaghan said, "We hope to eventually purchase more land, but we have to start small." The group plans to focus its fund-raising on students. It may ask for support through a student levy at various Ontario universities. The group hopes to form a coalition with non-governmental organizations and others.

The Queen's Land Trust group meets every Monday night at 9 p.m. in the Commons, 195 University Avenue. "We need much help as possible if we're going to make this happen," said Mitchell.

"This isn't like some projects that fade away after a year. Your grandchildren will be able to see the results of your work," said.

Asia in the 1990's
Experts converge at Queen's conference

BY STEFANIE CECCHINI
 The Queen's Journal

Scholars, policy-makers, and experts from Asia and North America gathered together this past weekend at Queen's, to discuss social, economic, and political issues affecting Asian countries.

The Programme for the Study of National and International Development (SNID) hosted an international conference on "Asia in the 1990s: Meeting and Making a New World." Coordinator Dr. Jayant Lele, and SNID, an interdisciplinary programme of the department of political studies, prepared and organized the three-day conference on current Asian concerns.

The conference consisted of a variety of presentations that pertained largely to the Asian countries, but also some northern countries, and covered a wide range of issues including development, geopolitics, trade, gender, community development, and the environment.

One of the sessions, "Asian Women and the International Division of Labour," emphasized gender inequalities and the exploitation of women.

Ludmilla Kwitko, from the University of Queensland, Australia, addressed the effects of capitalist development, patriarchy, and poverty on women in Hong Kong and the Philippines.

Similarly, Wu Qing of the Beijing Foreign Studies University examined the impact of reforms on educated and uneducated women in China, and their struggle for equality.

Other speakers discussed the female job ghetto in some Asian countries — domestic work, entertainment, and prostitution.

Another session, "Community Development and Community-Based Rehabilitation in Asia," reviewed the necessary changes for improving the status and rehabilitating people with disabilities.

The session "Asian Environment and Development" dealt with the negative consequences of commercial development.

Sunderlal Bahuguna, of the Chipko Movement in India, emphasized the need to develop a protection policy to save the Himalayan forests from aggressive development, and raise this issue as a global awareness.

Sing Chew of Humboldt State University, Arcata, examined the implications of rapid economic growth in South-East Asia, particularly environmental degradation and the destruction of aboriginal groups.

The conference received excellent reviews from participants.

The Director of the School of Rehabilitation Therapy, Dr. Malcolm Peat, commented that "the conference is very relevant to social, political and health issues and is most effective because it was an opportunity for graduates, faculty and visitors to participate in a single event."

Another participant, Dr. Bruce Berman, a political studies professor at Queen's, called the conference interesting and impressive.

"It filled in a lot of gaps. The presentations were of a very high calibre and were well worth hearing," he said.

AMS executive must respond

The Alma Mater Society is facing its greatest challenge—and that challenge is coming from within.

At last week's Alma Mater Society Assembly meeting, three commissioners on the social side of the student government put on their gloves and came out punching.

And Round one definitely went to the commissioners.

The three commissioners—Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell, Academic Affairs Commissioner Taz Pirmohamed and Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin—read prepared statements expressing their dissatisfaction with the executive. They discussed the executive's lack of commitment to the goals of the commissioners, goals such as safe and responsible Alumni Weekend, OUSA and productive working relations in general.

The attack was not expected. AMS President Katherine Philips opened the Assembly meeting by thanking all the people who worked so hard to make Alumni Weekend successful, a group of people from whom she excluded herself. Her upbeat tone quickly changed as the extent of her gaffe was realized.

Though Philips said it was fair such allegations be brought up at Assembly, some people think the commissioners behaved unfairly. These people think such conversations should be held in private only. But these are the people who don't treat student government as it should be treated—as a government, rife with opposition, debate, frustrations and hopes for change.

The commissioners did try to express their concerns in private.

They were brushed off, dismissed and one was even told condescendingly that they were only "middle management"—middle management that is being eliminated at other schools.

This remark was explained by Vice-President (Operations) Tim Wilson as meant only to point out that overlap in AMS services could not be afforded.

But what does that really mean? Does that mean that someone else is doing the jobs of the commissioners? Does that mean that the commissioners cannot expect support of policy—on both personal and political levels—from the people who hired them to do those jobs? Does that mean that Wilson is looking at getting rid of these positions—since that, he said, is what is being done in every other student government?

It would not be implausible to think that this is the case as Philips responded to the complaints with talk of plans currently underway to overhaul AMS structures. Vice-President (University Affairs)

Obviously the social side of the AMS is not given the same priority by the executive as the corporate side is given. The only solution Assembly members were left with was the promise of a mediator to help resolve the conflict. To the commissioners, this offer must seem like a slap in the face. They want from Philips, Minerson and Wilson a commitment—they want support for their efforts. They want to hear that the executive will work on their side.

Obviously there is more to this situation than meets the eye. It is important and fortunate that the commissioners brought their complaints to all of Assembly and the student body. Their complaints should force the executive to be open about their plans for the student government as well as supportive of the people working with them. This situation provides the executive—especially Philips—with an opportunity to grab the reins and display some leadership. (Already they appear to have failed in getting the most from these commissioners who, since they took their positions, appear to have acted with enthusiasm and dedication.)

Philips should view this situation as an opportunity—an opportunity to respond to the commissioners and lead the AMS in more open and accountable directions.

The education of a mayor

Kingston Mayor Ken Matthews is receiving an education. The grassroots-style politician from North Kingston was named mayor-designate last month and since then, Matthews has managed to raise doubts among the community over his suitability for the position.

A few weeks ago, Matthews was quoted in the Whig-Standard referring to a disabled woman's legal action in a sexual assault case as a "kangaroo court."

Besides trivializing the action taken by a victim of sexual assault, the comment struck a blow against the notion of a non-biased judiciary, independent of the legislative arm of government. His comments in the Whig created an intimidating environment for citizens who wish to exercise their legal rights.

In response, Matthews insisted that he had been misquoted by the Whig. This defense, however, does little to repair the damage caused by the comments and leaves many questions unanswered.

If Matthews was misquoted and if he did, in fact, realize that the comments attributed to him were offensive, why did it take him seven days and pressure from council to issue an apology?

This question, which Matthews has yet to answer, suggests that perhaps the mayor does not understand why the comments were offensive. At a special city council meeting held to discuss the issue, Matthews offered his apology "if I offended any individual or group" and asked what else the representatives from the Disabled Women's Network, the Sexual Assault Crisis Centre and a local battered women's shelter wanted to hear from him.

It is disappointing that Matthews did not realize the importance of listening to the concerns of these groups. When a woman from the Disabled Women's Network shared her reaction and concerns with council, Matthews interrupted her to demand an apology for suggesting that he actually made the comments.

The meeting could have been the place where Matthews listened to the concerns of the community. Instead, he offered indignant denials and an apology which fell short of acknowledging the damage the comments had caused.

At the end of the meeting which was intended to clarify Matthews' attitudes concerning the remarks, the only certainty that emerged was that Matthews would not tolerate any individual who suggested that the quote was accurate. The vital tasks neglected by the mayor included reassuring the community of his commitment to an unbiased, independent legal system and demonstrating that he takes the issues of sexual assault and harassment seriously, and recognizes the special risks that disabled women face.

As long as the community is left without these assurances, the damage from the kangaroo court comments will not be repaired.

Fourteen days after the comments were printed, Matthews met with students at Queen's to discuss the issue further. This time, Matthews listened to the concerns of tors, who are not required to attend Assembly and were not at the meeting when the complaints were made, made no complaints of their own. In fact, the services director arrived at The Journal House after the Assembly meeting to ensure that the story would portray Wilson in a positive light.

Obviously the social side of the AMS is not given the same priority by the executive as the corporate side is given. The only solution Assembly members were left with was the promise of a mediator to help resolve the conflict. To the commissioners, this offer must seem like a slap in the face. They want from Philips, Minerson and Wilson a commitment—they want support for their efforts. They want to hear that the executive will work on their side.

the Kingston Women's Collective and the Disabled Women's Network. This was a new experience for Matthews, who is comfortable dealing with individual constituents, yet appears confused when asked to address the needs of groups in the community. He believes in equality for all, yet his vision of equality is one in which nobody gets special treatment.

Whether this style of politics be effective for Kingston remains to be seen, but Matthews clearly has his work cut out for him.

Matthews must prove now that he is capable of mediating conflicting and balancing interests. He must prove that he is a mayor who moves beyond self-interest and listens to the concerns of the community and act in his constituent's interest. He must prove that he is open-minded enough to continue his education, by listening to special concerns of groups in the community.

Surface accountability

The Surface controversy isn't about censorship, it's about blanket funding of a paper which claimed to represent the Arts and Science students, but didn't. Only mainstream papers with mainstream views can expect to get blanket funding. See The Journal and Golden Words. (At least Golden Words is funny, usually, and it doesn't threaten to kill anybody. Usually.)

Iron Lotus was the last straw, but even this year's milder editions featured at least one writer threatening white people (like me) with mutilation or death. That's bad journalism. It's hate literature, it's a sorry state of affairs, and it isn't even funny; but still, Surface hasn't been censored. A majority of students just declined to pay for it.

I voted against funding Surface in the referendum, but if I see it for sale I will certainly buy it. I buy lots of weird papers. I even buy The Globe and Mail, but I don't want it paid for out of my student fees. I want to have a choice. I think it will be good for Surface to have to be accountable to the people who read it. That's how things work in the real world.

Tory myth

I wish to extend my appreciation to Mr. Raymond de Souza for his courageous article "Who's Tory Now?" in the Oct. 29 Feature in the Queen's Journal. He takes a position expected of many Tory cronies after their recent election humiliation when he boldly self-flagellates for the party not giving the Canadian people a reason to vote Conservative. Yet even in admitting that the party did make mistakes, Mr. de Souza insists on the "proud history" of the Conservative party and its "instincts of social justice and community concern." The "Tory tradition" that Mr. de Souza cites which has so often in the past accomplished "collective goals" in its "sense of obliga-

Fashion police

I write this in response to the letter "Final Warning", which was written by "Disgruntled Frosh". In the letter the student voices his/her belief that wearing clothing denoting the names of other universities is "totally inappropriate". After reading this letter I was uncertain if it was written solely for humour or if the person was sincerely disgruntled. If meant to amuse, the author has made some genuinely humorous points.

If meant as a legitimate commentary, it is a sad statement of the Queen's need for conformity. During the years in which students are often trying desperately to assert their independence and individuality, why does the pressure to conform to fashion codes weight so heavy? Everyone must have a $300 jacket. In Engineering it goes a bit further. Not only is a jacket necessary, but if it remains clean or unscuffed (ie. not purpled or run over), it is looked down upon as a fashion faux-pas.

It is understandable for Queen's students to wear Queen's clothing to show their pride or "Queen's Spirit". I will even admit to being the owner of a Queen's sweatshirt and a Queen's cap, both of which I wear with considerable pride (which is pretty rare for a Graduate Student, especially one which completed his undergraduate degree at McGill). But to assert that wearing clothing from other schools is somehow inappropriate is absurd.

Queen's spirit

The last time I was at Alfie's on a Wednesday, there were perhaps 70 people all congregated around the large screen T.V. watching Beverly Hills 90210. After the show was over, everyone left.

So, perhaps it is the drink prices. In my first year, a pitcher was only $6.60. Perhaps it is the I.D. restrictions. I was only 18 in my first year, and still spent more time in Alfie's than I did in classes. It seems that to this younger crop of Queen's students it is more important to keep up with Dylan's angst and Donna's virginity than it is to keep up with the Gaels. It is politically incorrect to be elitist, so we are no longer encouraged to think of ourselves as the best. There is no initiation to make one feel a part of anything more special than your high school. It is now unacceptable to promote the idea of having a drink, and having a good time. I hope that this year's street party is proof that perhaps we need not be so uptight. It is possible to drink, to have a good time, and not to cause mass destruction. I am not pessimistic about Queen's Spirit dying. I am sure it will enjoy a resurgence. I am very bitter, however, that it was killed while I was here.

The Holocaust Remembered

In the summer of 1989, I participated in the Israel Pilgrimage/Poland Seminar. Together with 60 other teenagers from all over the United States and Canada, I spent one week in Poland visiting what was left of five concentration and death camps - and five weeks in Israel. It seems only appropriate that on the anniversary of Kristallnacht I share with the Queen's Community my experiences of that summer when I was sixteen.

It would be hard to express the magnitude of what I saw in Poland and the death camps. At the Maidanek Concentration Camp, the 800,000 shoes displayed were not just shoes but 800,000 lives that I was never given the opportunity to know, and 800,000 voices that I could never hear. The ashes were not just ashes, they were tangible evidence of the human lives the world has lost.

I could go on with numbers, and describe other camps we went to, but what was most important were the feelings I had in that week. As I walked into the third of the 'shoe barracks' at Maidanek I was overcome by the smell of human flesh. Never before had I smelt something quite like this. I do not know what pushed me to go all the way to the end of the barrack. In some way I felt compelled to see everything. Since all the light bulbs were burned out, I could hardly see anything, yet I continued. When I reached the very back end of the barrack, I could see nothing, yet the smell of human death surrounded me. Quite suddenly, a ray of sunlight came in through a crack in the wall and illuminated only one shoe, a child's shoe. I left the barrack as soon as I could pull myself away. I was not strong enough to deal with what I had just seen. Yet, I was only seeing this shoe fifty years after the child who had worn it was killed. I was only seeing what was left, I never got to see what had occurred, nor who had been so ruthlessly destroyed.

It is impossible to imagine what must have happened to those people fifty years ago, their feelings, their loves, their loss. I know that what I experienced in that one week was more than I could have ever imagined, yet it was nothing compared to what millions of people experienced during the Holocaust. It is for that reason that remembering the Holocaust is not merely about remembering the numbers that died, but about remembering the loss of the sanctity of human life. It is for that reason that we must never let the Holocaust be forgotten, because the moment that we do, we lose our ability to value life.

"When I reached the very end of the barrack, I could see nothing, yet the smell of human death surrounded me."

Next Tuesday night marks the fifty-fifth anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass. On the night of November 9, 1938, organized Nazi violence destroyed hundreds of synagogues, looted thousands of Jewish shops and stores and sent tens of thousands of Jews to concentration camps.

The Nazis went to great extremes to ensure that only Jewish stores were destroyed, and that the fires from the burning synagogues did not spread and damage any non-Jewish buildings. As long as the "demonstrators" followed these guidelines, the police were not to stop them. As soon as sufficient officials were available orders were given that male, healthy, middle aged Jews from every district were to be rounded up and sent to concentration camps.

Kristallnacht marked the end of the era when Nazis used laws against the Jews and the beginning of the era in which they used extreme violence. Of course, while the Nazis were the perpetrators of violence on November 9th, much of the rest of the world just stood by and turned away Jewish refugees. Seven years after Kristallnacht, six million Jews were among the twelve million victims of the Holocaust.

It is important that we remember the Holocaust not merely as history for the sake of history, but as a lesson for the events of today. I am reminded of an old and oft repeated expression: they who forget the past are doomed to repeat it.

This spotlight was compiled by Silvia Luika, a third year Social Behaviour student with the help of Tamara Howarth. Both women are the Co-Presidents of the Queen's Hillel.

After the Magician: Before the Musicians

For about the space of half an hour in silence
I wait for the rite to begin, sipping my tea
Until the priest arrives at the altar with incense
And calls the seven trumpeters to play their part

The greatest show on earth or anywhere I know
Has only just begun and the house is packed:
I do not want to miss the end for anything
So I sit in silence rather than lose my place

Although I am awed by the special effects
And by the skilful staging I am waiting Myself for the call for volunteers to come Forth from the audience so I may play my part

Show me that show but give me that secret book
And give me that reed like a rod and let me see
The magic at work and show me that shining city
And show me also behind the scenes after the show.

Carving a life in stone

The Stone Diaries
Carol Shields
Random House
361 pgs.

It is no accident that The Stone Diaries has received so much critical acclaim and media attention this year. A sensual page-turner of a novel, it enthralls at once the imagination and the intellect with the enigma which lies at its heart: "Who was Daisy Goodwill, and why was she put on this earth?"

The novel pretends to be Daisy's autobiography. In ten neat chapters from birth to death, it tells the story of a middle-class twentieth-century woman who is in turn wife, mother, and grandmother. She is born in 1905 to an inarticulate mother and a poetic, stonemason father.

There are testimonies from Daisy's friends, and records of her correspondence. There is even a complicated family tree at the front of the book, and tucked into the middle, there is a slim section of photographs. But where is the picture of Daisy herself, among all the old photographs? And where, among all the letters from her friends and admirers, are the letters which she herself wrote?

The novel begins, like any good autobiography, at the beginning: "My mother's name was Mercy Stone Goodwill." But the structure begins to crumble before the first chapter has ended, as the narrator delays and obscures the moment of her own birth with an intricate mass of detail that can only be imaginary. What begins as the story of a woman's life ends as a catalogue of books read, addresses, and things left undone.

The enduring fascination of The Stone Diaries lies in this tension between the creative and the factual impulses. As Daisy struggles to express her life with the unwieldy tools of fact and conjecture, we too wrestle with the nature of autobiography itself. Daisy herself remains an enigma, glimpsed only fleetingly through her writing, or through the eyes of her friends and family.

At the same time, the novel is bursting with wonderful, believable characters: the eloquent stonemason, Cuyler Goodwill; the old Jew, Abram Skutari; sharp-tongued Alice; and soft, ignorant Mercy Stone. They are drawn with the broad brush strokes of a masterful storyteller.

The Stone Diaries is full of sensual descriptions as well. From the dripping red juice of the Malvern pudding to the octogewill endure and stand the test of time. Stone is beautiful and enduring, but it is also cold, unyielding, and uncomprehending. It is a clumsy medium for a monument to a beloved life or a repository for the future.

The expression of character, the critics tell us, is the chief function of the novel. But in The Stone Diaries, character is an elusive mystery which leads us on a merry chase. In the end, Daisy's life story lies at the bottom of the mind, like a beautiful branch of coral; its shape, its colour, its texture, all built up from the outer skeletons of tiny living creatures, long since dead. We know it is a monument to life, but the reality of that life eludes us. All we are left with is a marvelously intricate and beautiful stone, filled with tiny holes.

narian's white plastic purse, this is a novel you can smell and taste and feel. It is built up of the minutiae of everyday living, of gardens and kitchens, of food and sex and service. This is the stuff of women's lives.

The central image of the book is, of course, stone. Like her father before her, Daisy tries to give her story the permanence and solidity of a stone monument, so that it

Lasher will terrify and delight

Lasher
Anne Rice
Random House
578 pgs.

If you have read The Witching Hour, you know what it is like to be utterly terrified and mesmerized by a novel. The Witching Hour is the stimulating story of the intertwined lives of Lasher, a mysterious demon spirit, and the Mayfair witches, a legacy of powerful women with psychic powers. If you have not read this novel, there is now another good reason why you should: Lasher, Anne Rice's captivating conclusion to the adventure, has recently been released.

Lasher begins ten days after the end of The Witching Hour. On Christmas Day, the compelling spirit, Lasher, who is dangerously evil but impossible to resist, is made flesh - but not human. Two themes central to the novel are the possibility that Lasher could breed his own species, and the fight to prevent this.

The battle with Lasher is led by two characters, Michael and his wife Rowan. Dr. Rowan Mayfair is the most powerful of the Mayfair witches and the woman Lasher used to become flesh. She leaves her home with this new creature, only to become his prisoner; she is trapped in Europe, held captive by the "man" she created. At the same time, Michael is desperately trying to find out where his wife is, why she left, and how Lasher can be stopped.

The present, however, becomes a backdrop as mysteries of the past are uncovered. Anne Rice brilliantly fills in the blanks of the Mayfair family history which began in The Witching Hour, blanks that the reader didn't even know were there. We learn how Julien, a man, became Lasher's favourite witch; how Lasher manipulated his witches to have incestuous affairs in order to strengthen the witch blood line; and, most terrifyingly, we discover the truth behind the seemingly good and pure group of knowledge scholars, the Talamasca. Even the history of Lasher himself is revealed, from his creation, to his enslavement, to his desire to become flesh once more.

During the brief period that Lasher's child, a child conceived in rape. The issue of abortion is also dealt with, as Rowan tries to figure out how to kill the unborn child. Yet when she realizes that it is alive, growing and living inside her, it becomes difficult and soon impossible for her to take this step. Finally Rowan is able to escape with her child. This too is not an unfamiliar picture - a woman and child attempting to escape from a violently abusive lover. Anne Rice combines the known and the unknown in a terrifying story that transcends time and space.

Much like her other novels, Anne Rice gives the characters of Lasher a strong dose of sensuality and sexuality. Her language is sensual and her descriptions border on the erotic. Rice both terrifies and delights the reader throughout this hypnotic tale - which is fitting, since the ability to delight yet terrify his witches is also Lasher's greatest power.

If you have not read The Witching Hour, Lasher will not touch you as it should. It is a brilliant novel, but should be read as a sequel. In comparison to The Witching Hour, Lasher comes a close second, mainly because the first novel is so unique, different and mysterious - the second novel is much like the first, and therefore loses a little of the element of surprise that was abundant in The Witching Hour. It is, however, a fantastic novel that Anne Rice fans will love (if you are not a fan yet, read The Witching Hour and you soon will be!).

AMANDA WITHERS has reportedly been seen avoiding the light and staying up late.

A review copy of Lasher was provided courtesy of Printed Passage Books.

Ruck over to Richardson

BY ROB THOMPSON
The Queen's Journal

The rugby Gaels are a team with a mission: the OUAA rugby crown. They made their first step towards this goal by lambasting the Carleton Ravens 32-3 last Saturday at Richardson Stadium in the semi-final contest.

The Gaels took the play to the Ravens from the opening kick. Strong defence by Carleton kept the Gaels off the board until the 15th minute. The goose egg was cracked when Gareth Pettigrew pierced the uprigths from 33 yards to count a penalty, and Queen's never looked back from there.

Five minutes later, Pettigrew played a quick penalty, and the Gaels led the ball outside to speedster Drew McNaughton, who bolted to the corner of the end zone to count the try. Pettigrew negotiated the convert from a near impossible angle to extend the Gael lead to 10-0.

The next 15 minutes saw Carleton come to life, and apply some offensive pressure. A stalwart defensive stand by the Gaels inside their own five yard line kept the Ravens scoreless, and signalled the turning point in the game.

With five minutes remaining in the half, Gareth Pettigrew counted his second penalty of the afternoon thanks to a little help from the cross-bar. Two minutes later, Steve Pettigrew made two spectacular moves, and a crafty dummy, before dishing the ball to the outside. The ball eventually ended up in the hands of John Coffey who raced to the end zone for the try. Gareth Pettigrew's convert attempt failed. The teams went into half time with the Gaels leading by an 18 point margin.

Carleton came out in the second half with renewed enthusiasm. They applied steady pressure early, but could only muster a penalty in the 5th minute. Carleton showed their respect for the Gael defenders by not trying to run the ball from five yards out, instead settling for the penalty.

After the Raven's hit the scoresheet, the Gaels reclaimed control, not allowing the visitors any opportunity to cut in to the lead. The Carleton team did not help its own cause either. Overzealous backs were constantly being whistled for offside.

In the 20th minute of the half, Queen's extended their lead. After winning another scrum, some deft passing brought the ball to substitute Gord Davis who marched in for the try. Pettigrew made no mistake on the convert to make the count 25-3.

In injury time, the Gaels sent a message to the UWU Mustangs, their opposition next week in the finals, opting to run a penalty from twelve yards out. After Rob Statton was denied at the goal line, the ball was fed to Brady Carthy who waltzed in to put an exclamation point on the victory. Gareth Pettigrew iced the cake with his third convert, and 12th point of the afternoon.

Coach Ferguson was content with having accomplished the first step towards a championship, noting that, "There's nothing worse than losing in the semi-finals."

His one criticism of the day was that some players focused more on individual

Gaels cruise past Carleton 32-3 in the semis.

Tricia Rickwood

ual performance in the late going, instead of playing as a team. He mentioned this, while citing that it is understandable when the game was such a lopsided affair.

This Saturday, both the first and second squads will be squaring off in the finals of their respective divisions. The firsts will host Western, whom they've beaten already this year by a 19-6 margin. The seconds will take on the Carleton second side. Both games are Saturday afternoon at Richardson Stadium. The firsts kick off at 1:00, with the seconds' game immediately after the conclusion of the firsts.

Gaels go to National Championships

BY JASON LEWIS
The Queen's Journal

Where do you start?! The OUAA/OWIAA cross-country championships were a phenomenal success for both the men's and women's teams. The first of their many triumphs last weekend was qualifying to run the CIAU championships in Halifax on November 6. The second was the profusion of OUAA/OWIAA all-stars from our humble school.

Judy Elfassy, Sophie Kenward and Suzanne Garrett (our rookie wonder who through some paradox received the annual award twice by the end of her first season) were the women's all stars and captain Todd Jones was the men's. On top of all this, coaches Jeff Bryson and Dave Scott-Thomas won the OWIAA Coach of the Year award. This honour was bestowed on them by the other coaches in the province.

The races themselves were two of the most exciting cross-country events of the year. Not only were they the provincial championships from which teams were selected to race in the CIAU championships, but it was the first time that powerhouse teams such as U of T, Western, Queen's and Windsor were all competing in the same events.

The women's 5km event started quickly and was soon controlled by Guelph's Kathy Butler. However, everything else was up for grabs and the Queen's women were right in the middle of it. Judy Elfassy ran an aggressive race and came up with an amazing sixth place finish. Right behind her were Sophie Kenward and Suzanne Garrett in ninth and tenth place. The three of them ran together throughout the race crushing any and all challengers. Kerry MacKelvie came in less than a minute behind them in 29th. Sharon Shew followed her up seconds later in 30th with Melissa Buchan 32nd and Heather King in 38th. These phenomenal performances earned them second place in the team standings.

The men's 10km race was just as exciting. Brendan Mathias won the race handily in 30:22, (this is the guy who ran in the Olympics for Canada a few years back). Queen's ran extraordinarily as a team with everyone putting out some of their best performances of the year. Todd Jones, the only athlete whose heart rate went down after the start, leapt out of the gate in his usual aggressive fashion. Throughout the race he ground it out with the knobs from Western and came up with a blistering kick to come in ninth just ahead of some weenie from U of T.

Derek Hackshaw was poetry in spikes throughout the race and came in with a 17th place finish just ten seconds later. Al Pribaz came in 21st with a textbook Pribaz performance. From a controlled start in the middle of the pack he relentlessly reeled in flagging opponents driving the fans crazy.

Grant Strachan, inspired no doubt by a vision from God, had the race of the season and placed 25th. Paul Green stayed on his feet this time and slugged it out for 32nd. Mark Arsenault and Chris Minnis scaled the opposition's fate in 38th and 61st. As a team they ranked third with U of T first and Western in second. They, as well as fourth place Windsor, drew the "Wild Cards" and a place on the starting line at the championships in lovely Nova Scotia.

Last weekend's races fulfilled the coaches' expectations and placed both the women's and men's teams in fourth place in the national rankings. Though the men's team is losing many of its regulars, there are a few young lions waiting in the wings. On the women's side, the combination of a dozen fast young athletes and OWIAA coaches of the year could very well turn the late 90's into a dynasty for Queen's cross-country.

FRANK & EARNEST

Hoops women pay dues to succeed

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

How would YOU build a quality basketball program? The women's Gaels, improving steadily for several years, serve as a good example.

To start, hiring the right coach is critical.

The Gaels have a fine coach in Dave Wilson, who guided them to a 23-11 record last season — their best ever. Queen's won two playoff games and the OW consolation title. They just missed their first Top Ten ranking and CIAU's trip. Wilson was OW East Coach of the Year.

Strong teams need excellent players. At Queen's, players must be top students, since admission cutoffs approach 85 per cent. It poses a problem because those student-athletes who can get academic scholarships elsewhere would require 94 per cent here. However, every Queen's coach has bright athletes to work with.

A team's commitment can bind it together.

Players must commit to staying together for their years at Queen's, and must stay academically eligible for athletics.

To improve, challenge better opposition.

Not until a team is respectable can it get games with stronger teams and have the chance to improve further. The Gaels travelled to Syracuse last year to face the Orangewomen, an NCAA Division I team. Though Queen's lost, the game was competitive. That game would have been unthinkable five years ago.

The program-building process could be summarized like this: You have to get the wins you need to get the match-ups you need to get the experience you need to get the recognition you need to get the players you need to get the wins you need.

That takes time. Right now, the Gaels are a "work in progress."

Queen's latest venture against strong teams came last weekend, when they travelled to the Calgary WEST (Women's Early Season Tournament). Things did not go their way — they lost three games to McGill (71-59), Simon Fraser (79-64), and Calgary (81-58). Yet Wilson sees this disappointment as a learning process his team must undergo to reach the next level.

"We learned a lesson out there," Wilson said. "We're not as good as we thought we were. We are capable of being good enough to stay with those teams. We thought because we were moving up in Ontario, we were moving up in Canada, but that's not necessarily the case."

What do the Gaels have to do to reach the next level? "We have to get stronger both physically and mentally, and we must increase our intensity level," Wilson said. "It's a matter of how hard you chase a loose ball, how hard you box out, how little advantage you allow someone."

The Gaels saw three excellent teams from three leagues. Calgary plays in Canada West. "I think Canada West has a lot of strong opposition to offer," Wilson said. "Calgary had an 87-game winning streak a few years ago. We'll see them again — hopefully from this we can learn how to beat them."

McGill is Quebec's best team. Queen's had a nine-point lead at halftime, yet couldn't close the deal. "In the second half, we went eight minutes without scoring. Physically, we match up well. We'll also see them again soon."

Wilson was impressed with Simon Fraser, an NAIA (National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics) school which offers full athletic scholarships. "We gave away two inches per player, and they were faster than us," Wilson said.

Queen's returns home this weekend, facing Bishop's Friday at 6 p.m., and Windsor Sunday at 2 p.m. They should beat both teams.

Later this month, the Gaels will challenge two strong NCAA schools — Buffalo and Canisius. Queen's must learn to beat those teams. Paying your dues, it's cuffed.

The Gaels hope dues-paying is ending, and that a national ranking and a spot in the CIAU's will follow next spring. Queen's is hosting the OW finals, and the CI's are in Calgary. The Gaels know the territory!

Tennis is Strictly Golden

BY MIKE LEWICKI
The Queen's Journal

The women's tennis season is finally over. After successfully recapturing the team championship over a week ago, Queen's sent two players to London this past weekend to compete for the Individual Championships in both singles and doubles. The players making the trip were, in my opinion, two of the best tennis players in the OWIAA, Bali Athwal and Pam Lewis. Just as they did all season long, Bali and Pam played a number of strong matches, which meant trouble for their opponents.

In singles play, Athwal entered the championships as the #1 ranked woman in university play, thanks to an undefeated season. After completing the regular season and the playoffs without a loss, she was the one to beat. The only problem was finding someone capable of beating her. In her semi-final match, she beat a strong baseliner from Western 6-0, 6-3. Utter dominance was the word for the match. In the finals, up against an experienced competitor from York, Bali proved once again too strong winning 6-1, 6-1. It was Athwal's first individual gold medal after picking up the silver last season. Congratulations!

In doubles action, Bali teamed up with first-time Queen's player Pam Lewis from Victoria, B.C. The pair of B.C. athletes, who showed tremendous improvements all season long, entered the weekend ranked #2 behind an undefeated Western squad. Regardless of that ranking, there was optimism that they could take it all. In the semi-finals, our team trailed 5-2 in the first set, saved 6 set points, and then rallied to win the set 7-6 in a tie-breaker. In the second set it was all Queen's as the pair played more confidently winning 6-2.

In the finals, our Gaels were in for a tough one against a very strong doubles team from Western. During the regular season the Queen's pair lost a close three set match with Western, but were nonetheless confident about their chances heading on to the court. Queen's prevailed in a tight first set, 6-4. In the second set we fought back from 5-1, but eventually lost in a tie-breaker 7-6. In the third set, however, our team was on fire.

We thoroughly outplayed the opposition and won all the key points. Bali was returning serves very well and Pam Lewis used the offensive lob like it was going out of style. Even when Western knew the lob was coming there was nothing they could do about it. Consequently, the Queen's pair won 6-1 for the match and for the gold. The final score read 6-4, 6-7, 6-1 (all the hard work and irritation must have been worth it, eh Pam? Probably not).

Anyway, this past weekend capped off an extremely successful season. Our Queen's tennis team claimed all the major awards. Congratulations to both Pam and Bali who are more than deserving of the awards they got. As the saying goes, "it couldn't have happened to two nicer people!"

Jordan retires?

The Queen's Journal

The Bishop's Gaitsers hoisted the Tindall Trophy, after defeating the Queen's Golden Gaels 72-66 in the final of the 5th annual Frank Tindall - McDonald's Invitational Basketball Tournament last Saturday night. The tourney saw semi-final games on Friday the 29th, with the championship and consolation played on Saturday.

The Gaitsers easily handled the Laurier Golden Hawks in the first semi-final affair 105-73. Greg Southward led all scorers Friday, notching 30 points.

In Friday's late game, the host Gaels didn't have nearly as easy a time reaching the championship game. The host squad escaped with a narrow 77-72 victory over the UNB Reds.

The Gaels got off to a rocky start as the Reds ran off nine straight points to start the contest. The Gaels regrouped after a time-out, and rattled off the next seven points to prevent UNB from running away early.

The Gaels evened the score at 25 with three minutes to go in the half, and then drained 11 of the next 13 points to open a nine point lead, the largest they would enjoy all night. A late free throw, and a three pointer at the buzzer by the Reds made the half time count 36-32 in favour of Queen's.

The second half, like the first was a physical affair, and both teams were in the penalty situation with plenty of time remaining. It was clutch free throw shooting that ultimately led to the Gael victory.

With five minutes remaining, and the Gaels up 65-58, UNB went into a full court press. This high octane defence forced several Gael turnovers which kept the estimated 300 spectators on the edges of their seats. With 30 seconds to play, the Reds finally equalized. However, it took the Gaels just ten seconds to reclaim a two point lead on a hoop by Les Harold. UNB failed on their final trip down court as freshman Rich Cook grabbed a huge board, and drew a foul. Dave Smart promptly sank two free throws to put the Reds to bed.

Despite playing with bruised and broken ribs, Smart led all Queen's scorers with 22 points, 15 in the second half.

The championship match saw Bishop's jump out in front early, and lead by as many as 16 points in the first half. Queen's were pawns in Bishop's hands as the Gaels could only drain 12 points in the first ten minutes.

The Gaels awoke late in the half, shutting down the Gaiter offensive machine, allowing only 6 points in the final 6 minutes of the first half. Mike Ruscitti and Geoff Budgell scored a combined 11 points to close out the half with the Gaels trailing 37-32. Budgell's jumper at the buzzer sent Queen's to the locker room on a high note.

Queen's finally equalized the game at 44 with twelve minutes to play. They had their defence to thank, as Bishop's sank a mere 11 points in the first ten minutes of the half.

From that point on however, the Gaels could not narrow the gap to under four points. The Gaitsers put it in cruise control to capture the victory, and the tournament championship. The Queen's downfall on the evening was their inability to

Gael up for Jackson

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

Mark Robinson, a four-year starter for the Queen's Golden Gaels football team, has been nominated by the OQIFC for the Russ Jackson Award.

Robinson, 22, a member of Applied Science '94 (Civil), is one of four candidates vying for this prestigious award. The Russ Jackson Award is presented annually by the CIAU to the Canadian university football player who best combines athletics with scholarship, leadership and citizenship. It is named in honour of Russell Stanley Jackson, an outstanding Canadian quarterback and CFL Hall-of-Famer.

A sturdy 6 ft 2 in, 296 lb. offensive tackle, Robinson won the Gaels' Rookie of the Year award in 1990, and was recently named to the conference All-Star team for the first time. He played an instrumental role in Queen's 1992 Vanier Cup championship. A unit captain for the past two seasons, Robinson has been a mentor and tutor for classmates and teammates who have looked to him for assistance and guidance.

Robinson has been an outstanding student throughout his years at Queen's, being named to the Dean's List in each of his first three years.

He has consistently ranked among the top ten of all Engineering students in his year. A three-time Canadian Scholar and CIAU Academic All-Canadian athlete, Robinson has won several scholarships at Queen's, including the Fluor Daniel, Susan Near, and James H. Rattray Memorial scholarships. He was awarded an NSERC research grant last summer, and earlier this fall was one of six Queen's athletes to win the Ted Reeve Award.

Despite his busy schedule filled with athletics and academics, Robinson has found substantial time to serve as a volunteer in the Kingston community, helping those less fortunate than himself. He has been an organizer, facilitator and umpire in the Kingston Beep Ball (blind baseball) league, which raises funds for the local Lung Association. Robinson also volunteers his time as a security officer for other charity events in Kingston.

Queen's nominees for the Jackson Award have often been successful in the past. Charlie Gallardo won the inaugural Jackson Award in 1986, also won a Rhodes Scholarship to Oxford, and recently completed his Ph.D. at Stanford.

Jock Climie, who won in 1989, currently plays professional football for the CFL's Ottawa Rough Riders while completing his Law degree at Queen's during the off-season.

This Sunday at 3:00pm, the men's soccer Gaels play Western at Richardson Stadium for the OUA final. The Gaels won the semis 2-0, scoring both goals in overtime. The Gaels have already qualified for the CIAU's to be held Nov 11-14.

Field day trip

BY JULIA BARSS
The Queen's Journal

On Thursday, October 28th, the Queen's field hockey team travelled to Toronto for the OWIAA field hockey playoffs. The team left with high hopes of returning to Kingston on Sunday with a medal, however, that was not to be.

The Gaels faced fourth ranked Western on Friday afternoon. The competition was fierce and although the Gaels dominated the play, they simply could not get the ball in the net.

At the end of seventy minutes of regulation play, the score was tied 0-0. Two fifteen minute overtime periods ensued and again neither team managed to score. After nearly two hours of continuous play, the game was to be determined by penalty strokes. Each team selected five strikers, none of whom managed to score after the first round, the strength of Jenn Purdy. Queen's goaltender, was evident. Finally, in sudden death strokes, Western scored and moved onto the medal rounds.

Despite the disappointment felt by the team as a whole, the Gaels finished strong on Saturday with a 3-0 win against the Guelph Gryphons. Goals were scored by Margriet Zwart, Shauna McDonald, and Jill Boyd. Coaches Ben Froski and Laura Farres were pleased to see the team pull together and finish on a high note, not BBB's.

securing 5th place in the Ontario Women's Field Hockey League. This was the last game for several players who deserve recognition for their contributions to the team over the past few years. Sarah Waddock, a third year player and last week's athlete of the week, has been an important part of the offensive line this year in her position as right wing and she will not be easy to replace. Among the many awards Sarah has won at Queen's, she has yet to be challenged for the 'best field hockey thighs'.

Co-captains Jill Boyd and Laura Laila (silent but deadly) Brown have each played four seasons and will be sorely missed in the future. Apart from the excellent leadership with which they have provided the team, they have been recognized provincially and nationally for their accomplishments on the field.

Jill has been named OWIAA second and first team all-star during her years at Queen's and last year was named to the All-Canadian field hockey squad.

Laila has served as the key to the strong Queen's defense in her position as sweeper and was last year named an Ontario second team all-star. Both are formidable opponents on the field and have served as a source of inspiration for their teammates. All three will be missed next year (even if you aren't BBB's).

Utter domination

With squash season back in full swing, it seems that smoking the opposition is back in style. This past weekend, the Queen's women's squash team pounded their way to convincing victories over U of T and Ryerson in sectional play.

In their 1993 debut, the Gaels' dropped a grand total of eight points in ten matches, contributing to an incredible overall spread of 270 (Queen's) to 8 (U of T and Ryerson combined).

Strong team veterans Carolyn Russell, Carol-Ann Rodgers and Jody Melville set the stage with killer drives and lethal drops, allowing promising rookies Christine Ferguson and Katie Ritter to mop up the courts and clinch the victory.

This tournament win places the Gaels on top of the Eastern division, and in prime position to recapture the OWIAA title.

Athletes of the week

Liam Stevenson, goalie of the men's soccer team, led the team to a semi-final victory Saturday. Against third ranked Carleton, Stevenson had a shut out in regular and extra-play. He then saved key penalty shots to help his team to victory. This was Liam's fifth shut-out in the second half of the season. On Tuesday, the team was victorious against Toronto, capturing the Ontario East Championship. This qualifies the team to play in the OUA championships, to be held here on Sunday. Liam is a first year student from Belleville, Ontario.

Kristen Bridges, a first year Arts student from St. Catharines, is the female Athlete of the Week. At the OWIAA rowing championships in her home town, Kristen captured the gold medal in the women's heavyweight single category. Now, this is quite a feat in itself, but there's more! After winning this race, Kristen headed back up to the starting line to race in the women's lightweight double. Kristen and her partner, Anne Butler, also raced

Wright's stuff misfires

Lieutenant Kizhe: sumptuous costumes and spectacular sets

Derek Yarnell

Lieutenant Kizhe
Written by A. Colin Wright
Directed by Valerie Robertson
Theatre 5
BY DAVID LEACH
The Queen's Journal

Sub-Lieutenant Siniukhaev is having an especially bad day. After being struck from the roll list by a clerical error, our hapless hero is assumed to be dead by all his comrades in the Russian Army. Nothing he does can convince them otherwise. Worse still, Siniukhaev is forced to stand by and watch as the non-existent Lieutenant Kizhe, the creation of another clerical error, rises quickly through the ranks, becomes the favourite of the Emperor, and leads a life that anyone would envy.

This bizarre situation is the premise behind Theatre 5's new play, Lieutenant Kizhe, an adaptation by Dr. A. Colin Wright (who is Head of the Queen's Department of Russian Studies) of a novella by Yuri Tynyanov. The plot, basically an expansion on the age old story of The Emperor's New Clothes, is loaded with potential for irony. However, billed as a "comedy," Wright's script suffers from indecision, never certain of whether it wants to be dark satire or light slapstick.

Part of the problem is the character of Siniukhaev himself. Played by Glen Strathy, cherub-ckeeked and bursting with golly-gee-whiz good humour, he seems more appropriate to a Wonder Bread commercial than to this cynical descent into the absurd. The audience never really takes much interest in his predicament, as Wright's script has him talking about it more than it is actually dramatized.

There seems to be a deep schizophrenia in the play itself. From a scene in which the mad Emperor Paul I launches into a lunatic rage, expressing the irrationality of his tyrannical rule, the action shifts to the nudge-nudge wink-wink bed-hopping antics of the Russian aristocracy, complete with swooning damsels and jiggling bedsprings.

The result? Something like the mutant lovechild of Waiting for Godot and a British sex farce.

All this isn't to say that the play doesn't have its moments. Director Valerie Robertson gets some solid performances from most of her cast. David Prosser as Paul I is wonderfully paranoid and unpredictable, creating the image of a demented child given an entire nation as his plaything. Likewise, Robert Bowes as Count Neledinsky-Meletsky, a scheming adviser to the Emperor with a penchant for rhyming couplets, positively oozes with reptilian charm.

And the technical side of the production is as tight as a kettle drum. From Michael Page's St. Petersburg set design with the statue of The Bronze Horseman receding in the distance, to the use of Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kizhe Suite" as scene-bridging music to L.E. Graham's period costumes, the production strikes all the right poses.

Which makes it all the more unfortunate that the script can't meet the high expectations set by the rest of the play. Still, whether you like it or not, Lieutenant Kizhe will nonetheless keep theatre-goers talking after they leave the theatre.

Un Coeur en Hiver
Directed by Claude Sautet

BY IAN PETRIE
The Queen's Journal

That there is a dearth of intelligent films for adults in these troubled times is no longer a topic for conversation (was it ever?): it's a truism. And for good reason: mention "American popular culture" and the words "hegemonic" and "ironic" spring to mind all too readily (if only they both connoted Gramsci then maybe things wouldn't be so bad). Thus, anyone with an appetite for something more than the cinematic equivalent of microwave cooking (technologically impressive but tasteless) must look either to Canada's frequently commendable, though understandably miniscule, output, or abroad.

Even across the Atlantic, still in many ways the cultural metropole to our hinterland, the prospects of an intelligent, yet accessible, film are rather bleak. Aside from the Merchant-Ivory sweatshop (of course I'm referring to those bulky period costumes) and the ever-ascendant Branagh, both purveyors of elevated escapism, and the rather more iconoclastic trio of Jordan, Loach and Leigh, no one is making films in Britain (everyone's moved to L.A.). That leaves the educated would-be consumer with the Continent (and subtitles, which, much like red wine, often have the effect of automatically alienating some people who really should learn to love them).

This admittedly prolix prologue brings me to Un Coeur en Hiver, a French drama which, though not fully realized, illustrates that mainstream European film continues to outstrip its would-be American counterpart, and that maybe, just maybe, there's something more than just typical Gallic effrontery to the recent furor aroused by the French opening of Jurassic Park. Because this is a French film, we are treated to numerous shots of both coffee and cigarettes (which I like) and emaciated, immaculately dressed people with bloodless, barely perceptible lips (which I don't like). And, for good measure, the setting of record is a bistro (complete with an obsequious maître d').

Maxime (Andre Dussollier) and Stephane (Daniel Auteuil) are nominally business partners and best friends, the former being the polished and self-assured proprietor of an exclusive violin workshop, the latter his reticent yet enormously talented luthier. As Stephane's narration tells us, the pair's relationship is strictly segregated, with no contact outside of the shop. Maxime, however, nevertheless manages to dominate both arenas, wooing the clients by day and regaling the reclusive Stephane with tales of his nightly extra-marital pleasures. As Stephane admits, Maxime "enjoys winning so much, it's a pleasure to lose to him."

The men's ordered, if not equal, relationship is disrupted by Maxime's newfound romantic commitment to Camille (Emmanuelle Béart), a talented young violinist who also becomes the firm's new client. Stephane is taken aback by this development, not only because of Maxime's rakish proclivities (Maxime notes, prophetically, of his wife, "You don't spend a lifetime with a good friend," while of Camille he observes, "It's a new experience admiring someone I'm in love with") but also because the affair has taken place for two months under his nose without a single mention from Maxime.

This, of course, is stock stuff: the woman as spoiler, ruining the perfect relationship of two men. In any such scenario, a degree of homoeroticism is present, be it implicit or explicit. A working class buddy picture such as Goin' Down the Road is an example of the former, while David Cronenberg's Dead Ringers pretty much tops the rest of the field in the latter case, its Pandora figure unleashing an utterly harrowing decline into brotherly incest.

Exploring this theme is even more interesting in terms of groups. Consider, for example, the bulk of American films about the Vietnam war, in which American military male bonding is confronted by an Asian Other, which is broadly conceived as sensual and feminine, and the bulk of whose celluloid representatives are Daniel Auteuil and Emmanuelle Béart in Sautet's Un Coeur en Hiver.

Fatal Instinct
Directed by Carl Reiner
Capitol Theatre
BY CHRIS ZABEL
The Queen's Journal

First there was Airplane!, unquestionably a funny movie, so much so that it almost isn't annoying when one's housemates keep telling you to stop calling them Shirley. Then Airplane! begot Naked Gun, obviously more of the same, but still interesting even if only for the innovation in sequel titles which now rules out a simple "II" as acceptable. Hot Shots! smelled a little suspicious, but as they had discovered a new genre to plunder, sincere irritation was still unjustified. However, Men in Tights looked too funny in reality for anyone to seriously believe that poking fun at generic quirks is still valuable movie-making. All of this leads us to the bottom of the barrel, prodding the sludge or pickle stems, with Fatal Instinct.

Most of the problem here is that Mr. Reiner has confused ideas about the nature of satire. The typical practice is to undercut something that people mistakenly take seriously. (Apologies to Prof. "Satire-is-impossible-to-define" Sampson). No one likely took either Fatal Attraction or Basic Instinct seriously, and this movie only amounts to a repetition of ground already covered in post-movie chitchat. The only way that this movie can work is if the audience consists of a group of incredibly silly people who experience a beatific revelation from the idea that perhaps a lesbian with an ice-pick is a little farfetched. The mental acrobatics make this movie pathetic. Fatal Instinct isn't funny precisely because it tries so damn hard to be. Ned Ravine (Armand Assante) is a Bogartesque, Douglas/Nolteish cop/defence-attorney who evidently has few qualms about ripping off Leslie Nielsen's character. He meets Lola Cain (Sean Young) who is quick to tell him, "You really are incredibly stupid, I like that in a man" (and in a movie too - I mean they didn't even put a gun to her head to say this). The rest of the movie unfolds between the plot lines of Cape Fear, Basic Instinct, Sleeping With the Enemy, Fatal Attraction, 9 1/2 Weeks, Chinatown, etc. It's sort of fun to play spot the allusion, but not really.

One can predict the jokes that this sort of movie comes up with (partially because many of the exact same gags were done in its predecessors), but let me give a taste for those not yet discouraged. Ned is really sweaty when he gets into his car, but that doesn't matter because his car is equipped with a ceiling fan (arf arf). And it blows so hard that when gets out of the car, his hair is sticking up (guffa guffa). And the prison isn't called San Quentin, it's called Sam Quentin (chuckle chuckle). And one of the reporters crowding around the prisoner isn't holding a microphone, she has an ice cream scoop (ho ho, ha ha, hee hee). My grandmother might have liked the Sam Quentin them in syndication and we know that they're living comfortably off fat royalty cheques. But, because our friends from Twin Peaks got shafted in a big way, they are forced to seek a living in the cold world of movies where eccentricity and stylish strangeness really aren't assets after all. Results have been predictably depressing. At any rate, Sherilyn still has her mole, but don't expect her to tie a knot in a cherry stem.

This movie is just enough funny parts to make a commercial, so if you've seen of the trailers, look no further.

Canadian film is impolite

Impolite
Directed by David Hauka
Princess Court Cinema
BY OWIN LAMBECK
The Queen's Journal

"Paris is dead." These words, spoken by an anonymous caller, mark the beginning of Jack Yeats' quest in Impolite, a slow-paced, cerebral film directed by David Hauka. Paris O'Rourke is a celebrity zillionaire who may or may not be dead. Jack, played Robert Wisden, is a disgraced reporter for the Vancouver Gazette who thinks that if he can get this story he can kick-start his career and quit writing obituaries. The only leads he has to start with are the phone call and a torn half of O'Rourke's diary. At the end of the diary is written "To Be..." but the second half of the phrase is missing. All of these elements suggest early on that the film will be a mystery, where the formulaic, "down on his luck" hero solves the case and returns to his former glory. As it turns out, however, Impolite is really a character study of one man's search for redemption.

In his efforts to find Paris, Jack goes through many trials and tribulations, including being shaken up by an unfriendly cop, having his car towed, and getting no helpful information (but plenty of free drinks) from the people he meets with. Throughout all of his problems, however, Jack seems calmly resigned to the fact that life is stacked against him. None of his setbacks take him by surprise, and despite being strongly focussed on getting his story, he seems ambivalent as to whether or not he is successful. Jack's dry cynicism comes out in various forms. Sometimes it is witty, as when a police officer tells her partner to stop harassing him, and he says to her, "Do you get paid extra for doing the thinking for both of you?" Often though, lines are so obscure that they make little sense.

For instance, on the subject of love, Jack says to his ex-wife, "It's okay as long as the parties involved make sure their inner children are in bed before the lights go out." Complex and vague lines such as this suggest that beneath Jack's devil-may-care attitude there is a much more thoughtful and philosophical person struggling to get out.

Following Jack's inner quest for redemption is compelling at times, but the film suffers from a lack of direction. The story fails to move forward, and is essentially a mere series of encounters with bizarre people. This could have worked well had the situations been played up for their comedic value, but the more intellectual route taken by screenwriter Michael McKinley would have been better supported if the story was stronger. Despite this weakness, Robert Wisden is an engaging enough personality to carry the film through some of its slower moments. His portrayal of Jack presents an interesting paradox, because despite being pathetic, self-doubting and cynical, he is also charismatic, stylish and bold.

The development of Jack's character works well partly because a diverse supporting cast for him play off. Standouts include Christopher Plummer as a priest who is the spiritual opposite of his brother Paris, Suzy Joachim, as a religious fanatic turned seductress, and Susan Hogan as Dr. Gloria. Done, an eccentric intellectual who conducts intimate literature seminars with bizarre sexual overtones.

Besides being an interesting character study, Impolite is also enjoyable simply because it is so distinctly Canadian. When Jack interrupts Dr. Sardone, for example, she is quizzing two young people on quotations by Margaret Atwood. Little details too, such as a copy of The Canadian Dictionary on Jack's desk suggest that filmmakers have gone out of their way to identify the nationalistic film.

Impolite is an impressive film in many ways. The dialogue is witty, the characters engaging and the situations entertaining. While the film has its weaknesses, it is successful in most of the ways that interesting characters, and the performances of Wisden and Plummer are outstanding. Although it lacks the Chopin Preludes. These short pieces, making use of all the major and minor keys in the progression of the circle of fifths, present a wide span of emotions and impressions by varying harmonies, tone, and texprostitutes. I won't even get into films about male team sports...

One of the strengths of Un Coeur en Hiver is its avoidance of the cliches all too often found in such depictions of love triangles. It is worth noting that the subtext works both ways, as Camille's relationship with Maxime also prompts a fissure in her relationship with her long-time agent, Regine (Brigitte Catillon), although this is neither fully explored nor, as it turns out, is it lasting. The film's tone and pacing are decidedly understated, appropriate to the world of professional classical music in which the characters move: the tension implicit in the music is checked not only by Stephane's buttoned-down emotions, but by the rigorous standards of decorum and business practice to which all the characters must adhere.

The euphemistic "heart in winter" of the title is sufficiently ambiguous to allow for varied interpretation, particularly in light of the plot. Camille initially views the decorous yet austere Stephane (the caretaker of her violin) as an enigma at best, an irritant at worst. In the course of a demanding recording session (Ravel's trio sonatas), she comes to depend on Stephane, professionally and, increasingly, emotionally. At the crucial moment, however, he removes himself from her life, ensuring that turbulence and confrontation ensue.

For some viewers, this may be the extent of the story. The subtext surrounding Stephane and Maxime remains buried, Stephane being an obviously repressed heterosexual. (One can easily imagine a red-headed Frenchman seeing no less than the betrayal of the nation itself in Auteuil's rejection of the admittedly ravishing Beart, pointing a finger at the screen, letting fly with a hearty "J'accuse!")

There is a crucial scene upon which any interpretation hinges. Near the film's close, the elderly mentor to both Stephane and Maxime has passed away. The next morning, Camille speaks briefly with Stephane, while Maxime gets the car. "You loved him, didn't you?" asks Camille. "I used to think he was the only one I could love," replies Stephane. Who is the "he" in this answer, the departed mentor or Maxime (who has also departed from Stephane's life)?

To choose the latter interpretation is to carry the film's subtext to its logical conclusion: Stephane is a repressed homosexual, whose is surprised to eventually find himself a repressed heterosexual as well. But, to its credit, Un Coeur en Hiver never fully articulates this, simply creating a tension which makes for compelling viewing. (Have I given away too much plot? Probably. But hey, Pauline Kael got away with it for years, and at The New Yorker no less.)

A well-made character piece (with enough panache and melodrama to put people in the seats), Un Coeur en Hiver rests largely on its performances. Even at her most officious, Emmanuelle Beart (Manon des Sources, La Belle Noiseuse) has a wide-eyed innocence entirely appropriate for the ultimately fragile Camille, and, to boldly emigrate to objectification country, she's simply lovely to behold. Daniel Auteuil (Jean de Florette, Manon des Sources) succeeds in making the emotionally stunted Stephane intriguing (if not exactly appealing), which is essential to the story's credibility.

One drawback of the film is the aforementioned B-plot featuring the mentor of Stephane and Maxime. Although it flirts with meaning, its appearances are so sporadic that it becomes entirely subsumed by the film's core relationship, and, as a result, its complementary role seems tacked on.

Another French strings n' flings offering, last year's Tous les matins du monde, was a foreign film of the worst sort, wielding its subtleties and period setting in such a way as to bludgeon a credulous New World audience into thinking they were getting art. Even with both Gerard Depardieu and his son, it was a nothing more than a classy snooze.

Un Coeur en Hiver commits no such sin. It is stylish and contemporary without being superficial; it provides enough emotional ground for the viewer to cover without being ponderous; it does not, like too many recent American films, rely on a character sleeping with their psychiatrist or a character suffering an unusual trauma. In short, it is a very good adult film.

Perfectly Good Piano

Louis Lortie
Grant Hall
BY RANNE
The Queen's Journal

Last Thursday, an exceptional pianist performed at Grant Hall. This concert, presented by the Performing Arts Office, featured Canadian Louis Lortie, winner of numerous international piano competitions. Lortie has performed concert tours and recitals around the world, from China to North America, and has received several awards, including the National Award and two Junos.

His program for this performance consisted of two impressive pieces: Franz Schubert's Sonata in G major and the Twenty-Four Preludes by Frederic Chopin. The Sonata, in four movements, is an extremely long and difficult piece to accomplish, yet it was played with ease and control. The occurring melody was clear and unmistakable. However, it became somewhat boring and tiresome. Even though this piece is repetitive, there is room for an assortment in tone and texture. It was disappointing that Lortie tended to play "on the surface." There wasn't enough variety, so it never really flourished.

In the second half of the program, he played the Chopin Preludes. These short pieces, making use of all the major and minor keys in the progression of the circle of fifths, present a wide span of emotions and impressions by varying harmonies, tone, and texture. Lortie certainly established this. His performance was dramatic - he created excitement with his brilliant technique and spotless runs, sombre timbres with his introspective tone, and passionate moments with soaring melodies and fine use of rubato.

As a result, the audience was much more receptive to the second half of the recital. Two other factors helped make this section more enjoyable: first, the pieces were shorter and more diverse, and secondly, there were some, such as the preludes in A major, C sharp minor, D flat major, and C minor which were very familiar to most listeners.

After a lengthy applause, Lortie played several Chopin Etudes as an encore. He began playing the first piece, but decided that it was not suitable since the piano had lost its tune during the concert. Also, it was a very intense piece, requiring a great deal of energy and concentration. He abruptly stopped, mumbled some sort of apology, then played two others, fascinating the crowd.

Most impressive was Lortie's control throughout the performance. These pieces were extremely difficult, yet he made them seem so simple and effortless. During the Schubert Sonata, he hardly ever looked at the keyboard. His precise technique, clarity of melody, balance, and diversity in texture certainly resulted in a charming and outstanding concert.

Was it something I "Said"?

Even academics like to slug it out every once in a while - they just do it in the Times Literary Supplement

Last February, Ernest Gellner, the William Wyse Professor of Social Anthropology at Cambridge, reviewed recent Queen's guest speaker Edward Said's latest book, Culture and Imperialism, in the prestigious Times Literary Supplement. His negative comments consisted of a flurry of letters, treating readers of the TLS to a hearty diet of rhetoric for some four months, the "highlights" of which bear reprinting. In light of the Surface controversy, we thought you might find it interesting to see that even seasoned academics resort to hair-pulling scraps in the race relations minefield. This verbal melee may also help you in case you decide to duke it out with a worthy opponent in our Opinions section. Be warned that academic debate is pretty dry stuff. We have taken the liberty of adding standard Back Page wisecrack commentary and award debating points based on the arguments provided.

One more thing: to really get fly to what the name is pronounced Ya-EEED and Gellner are arguing about, you'd best be familiar with the general idea of orientalism: the European view of non-European cultures as mysterious, exotic and oh-so-gosh-darn cute; a sort of "it's a nice place but thank God I live in a civilized country" point of view.

Gellner's review of Said's Culture and Imperialism, TLS, February 19, 1993 is a kind of unstated, facile incense colonialism has grave dangers for the sensibility of anyone practising it...It is strange how very much Said misses out...the largely restrained indulgence in a kind of metaphysical projection of an abstract theme, would make it exceedingly difficult to defend against the charge that he is indeed an orientalist, in the negative sense that he has himself bestowed on the term...The problem of power and culture, and their turbulent relations during the great metamorphosis of the social world, is too important to be left to orient.

Following the Surface controversy will recognize this attack as the Dick Manoeuvre (named after anti-Surface campaigner Andrew Dick, or perhaps because people who do this are generally dicks). In this manoeuvre, you simply accuse your opponent of being the very thing that he or she condemns. It's the debating equivalent of Pee-Wee Herman's "I know what you are, but what am I?" Generally does not work without more elaboration. We'll award Gellner 5 points (this manoeuvre still works - remember the Surface referendum?) and one extra for realizing that the things are too big to be left to critics.

Gellner, TLS, March 19, 1993 Gellner...with sublime Orientalist insouciance submits 1,300 years of Muslim history to a series of sweeping generalizations about...Shiism, a construction manufactured out of a few books he has read in English on the subject...[Gellner has an] obsessive revulsion for 'Islam, whatever that is or may be...Most of Ernest Gellner's review is, a shabby performance. But those are the ways of Orientalism."

Said's response is the Spike Lee Defensive. Whitey doesn't know jack. There is considerable ammunition in such a statement, considering the fact that many Euro-critiques of non-Judeo-Christian cultures at best say "oh, how quaint" and at worst say "let's nuke 'em for Jesus". Coupled with the "See? This is exactly what I'm talking about" feel of his response, Said earns 25 points.

Gellner on Said, TLS, April 9, 1993 "...it would be very hard to defend Said from the charge that he deliberately distorts evidence in order to make out a case inspired by a bruised ego...[Said's Orientalism] is quite entertaining but intellectually insignificant...This self-glorification [of non-Westerners] appears to be extended even to those who, like Said himself, though perhaps Easterners by origin, are in fact fully naturalized and perfectly assimilated citizens of Woody Allen-land...I must announce that the ideas and attitudes Said ascribes to me are not mine, are very often the opposite of what I hold, and are often actually repugnant to me, and that hereby I publicly disclaim all responsibility for or connection with views attached to my name by Edward Said."

Ooh, nasty! Gellner is basically saying that Said, for all his I'm-a-person-of-colour-dammit preaching, probably likes to come home, watch Cheers, nosh on a Swanson's hungry man TV dinner and curl up in bed with a copy of the latest People magazine. The basic point Gellner's trying to get across is: Eddie, baby, you're as white as I am. Said has enriched himself well within white society, what with being on the "A list" in both the Manhattan cocktail party and Ivy League lecture circuits. In debates about race relations, this is called the "Oreo defence" and is worth 20 points. Alas, it's a cheap shot, but it works.

Said's response is the Spike Lee Defensive. Whitey doesn't know jack. There is considerable ammunition in such a statement, considering the fact that many Euro-critiques of non-Judeo-Christian cultures at best say "oh, how quaint" and at worst say "let's nuke 'em for Jesus". Coupled with the "See? This is exactly what I'm talking about" feel of his response, Said earns 25 points.

Gellner on Said, TLS, June 4, 1993 "Ernest Gellner is an academic Rumpelstiltskin, stamping his little feet when he doesn't get his way, appearing more unbalanced in attitudes that are now too extreme even for him to get away with...As a conpendium of reductive clichés and almost meaningless generalities [Gellner's analysis of the emergence of Muslim fundamentalism] could be considered of comical interest; as credible analysis of the Islamic (or any other) world it is almost pure drivel...Let him delight in his sophomoric patter by all means, but let him not at the time fool himself that what he says about Islam, or the formerly colonized world, or imperialism, or post-modernism, has anything to do with what any of them are really about...in every way it is unequipped to comprehend [Said's book]..."

It is Mr. Said running out of gas? This is a reheated Spike Lee Defensive. Surface had the same problem during the referendum. Its opponents had a broad range of arguments (it's reverse-racist, it isn't responsible to its shareholders, etc.) while its supporters consistently provided only one argument: we speak for those with no voice. We'll award two points to Said for name-calling.

Gellner on Said, TLS, June 11, 1993 "In his latest outburst, Edward Said makes many grave accusations against me. One of them may puzzle readers. "To make fun of "lit crit" is...to exhibit...bad faith and complicity with imperial power..." Was lit crit such a powerful enemy of imperial power that to ironize one school of it is to strengthen imperialism? Was it the exegeses of A Passage to India which brought down the Empire?"

Vocabulary builder time: exegesis is merely a ten-dollar word for literary analysis. Gellner has taken an argument of Said's and used an extreme example of that argument in order to poke holes in it. A more down-to-earth example: two friends of mine were watching a Benji movie where the lovable dog was facing off against a bear. One of them said "Benji will win because he's smarter." The other responded with "That's like saying you'd win a fight against Mike Tyson because you're smarter". Touché. 5 points to Gellner Gellner wins this match in a 31-27 decision thanks to the time-honoured tactic of the right: Attack from several angles, and emulate John Crosbie while you're at it. Said, on the other hand, chose, the "Jacob Two-Two" defence favoured by the left, which is based on the (false) premise: If I keep saying precisely the same thing over and over, I will eventually convince someone I'm right. It's a shame, for he makes several good points in his texts.

However, if you ignore the matter of debating points, you'll find that there is no clear winner in this argument; like Queen's student politics, nothing is ever actually resolved. It seems that even the academics prefer to eschew dialectic for verbal bloodshed. When will the carnage end?

Joey deVillia comes from the Philippines, where they wacked Magellan's butt something fierce, armed with only yo-yos and Scrunchies sticks. He celebrates his 26th birthday at a certain pub tonight. Bring gifts!

Ian Patric did the TLS research and is the resident expert on Simpsons plot inconsistencies.

CELEBRITY Recipes

Queen's: land of swimming pools, movie stars & students.

Surprise casserole

- 2 1/2 cups pasta (uncooked)
- 1 cup sour cream
- 2 tbsp plain yogurt
- 1 cup spaghetti sauce (any kind)
- 1/2 cup shredded cheese
- 1/2 cup cubed cheese
- 1/2 cup chopped celery
- 1 cup ground beef (drained)
- bread crumbs (optional)

Cook pasta until done, drain. Dump sour cream and yogurt onto pasta and mix. Put half of pasta at bottom of casserole dish, cover with ground beef, then cover with cubed cheese, half the spaghetti sauce, chopped celery. Then add the rest of the spaghetti sauce, the shredded cheese and bread crumbs if desired. Bake for 35-40 minutes or until cheese is crispy.

You can use any kind of pasta and any kind of cheese, but I think it's best with mozzarella inside and cheddar on top. Vegetarians can substitute the meat for mushrooms and green peppers sautéed in onions (carrots are also good).

Donna Wallen is the Anti-Racism Co-ordinator in the Human Rights Office. She is also a part time student in the faculty of law. She is presently working on the Anti-Racism policy for Queen's and is actively involved in pro-active anti-racist action both at the university and in the community.

Donna is available Mondays and Fridays 1 pm to 5 pm and Wednesdays 9 am to 1 pm in the Human Rights Office, room 109, Old Medical Building. Anyone with questions or concerns is welcome to drop by.

The Human Rights Office can help you with any human rights complaints, questions, or concerns. It also provides training of students and facilitates in human rights issues. The office can also assist you with informal/formal complaint procedures.

AMS Board of Directors Chair resigns

BY LORI THORLAKSON
The Queen's Journal
 Alma Mater Society Board of Directors Chair Catherine Emmerson resigned last night at the Alma Mater Society Annual Corporate
 Meeting, before a shocked and silent AMS executive.
 Reading her resignation letter to the Assembly, Emmerson cited a lack of "open lines of communication and trust" as one of the reasons for her decision. Many times she learned of proposals relating to the corporation at the last minute, she said.

 She then criticized AMS President Katherine Philips for being unaware of her duties with the Board of Directors.

 Differences in opinion over two fundamental policy changes created a gulf between Emmerson and the board. Emmerson said she disagreed with the AMS restructuring plans, accusing the executive of "using the restructuring committees as a band-aid for their mistakes."

 A second policy that Emmerson disagreed with was the decision not to "budget for zero," instead allowing the corporation to accumulate some surplus funds.
 "This is something I believed in and made a promise to uphold. Unfortunately, I was voted down,"
 Emmerson said.
 According to AMS Vice-President (Operations) Tim Wilson, it has been AMS policy since 1985 allow some aspects of the corporation to operate on a surplus.
 Philips said she was "completely shocked and surprised" at Emmerson's resignation.
 Dismissing Emmerson's accusation of shirking her board duties as "unfounded," Philips explained that it was only necessary for the Human Resources Committee,

Scratching the Surface from ASUS constitution

BY KAREN HALL and BRAD ELDER

The ill-fated campus paper, cially on the chopping block, as a motion will be brought forward at the next Arts and Science Undergraduate Society meeting to delete it from the ASUS constitution.

not produce a clear mandate for Steeves explained that the new motion, which will strike the Surface constitution from the ASUS constitution, will be handled concurrently with the approving of the ASUS budget—a budget which no longer includes money allocated to Surface.

Surface was the subject of an ASUS referendum on its funding earlier this fall. Fifty-five percent

Students seek power on Board of Trustees

BY DAVE COLEMAN
The Queen's Journal

The fact that students only have one vote on the body that makes all the major financial decisions for Queen's is a big problem, says Alumni Mater Society Vice-President (University Affairs) Todd Minerson.

The Board of Trustees, with 38 members, has only one voting student, and no voting faculty or staff. "We could talk until we're blue in the face," said Minerson. "But we can't put our hands up when it's time to vote."

The accountability of the Board of Trustees is also being questioned by the Ontario government.

In the bicameral system laid out in Queen's Royal Charter of 1841, the Board of Trustees, responsible for strategic planning and financial policy, and the Senate, responsible for internal academic procedures, are the two highest boards at Queen's.

A review of the composition of university boards began in October 1992, when the former Minister of Colleges and Universities, Richard Allen, handed down a set of recommendations for the revamping of university boards.

Among the recommendations, Allen indicated that students and employees — support staff as well as faculty — should be represented on the board.

In 1992, the Queen's Board of Trustees recognized staff, student and faculty representatives as "observers," able to participate in discussions of the board but not able to make motions or vote.

The board's response to the recommendation was to change "observer" to "representative to the board," to "reflect the fact that they are expected to, and do, participate fully in deliberations in both open and closed sessions."

The recognized representatives to the board are the AMS executive, the Graduate Student Society president, three members of the Faculty Association executive, the president of the Alumni Association, and four support staff representatives.

Minerson said that despite the name change, the representatives to the board are "just observers."

Barb Ashbury, president of local 1302 of the library technicians union, and a board representative said, "I don't feel I'm an equal participant. I'm not inclined to voice an opinion because it makes no difference [in the voting]."

Rector Dave Baar, the only voting student on the Board of Trustees, believes that voting is not crucial. "If you are persuasive and can present your case, you can sway the members," he said.

Baar sees representation as the key: "It is more important to have students on every committee."

The representatives to the board are on some of the board sub-committees with voting privileges. Minerson, who is on the Committee on Social Responsibility, said students are not represented on the most important committees.

"There are no students on the Finance Committee" Minerson said. "We have a strong problem with that, they decide all the financial issues" at Queen's, such as the controversial Student Assistance Levy.

Margaret Hooley, Secretary of the Board of Trustees, said "sub-committees are where the action is."

The Commission on Systemic Racism in the Ontario Criminal Justice System is holding a public forum to hear your experiences with, and views on, the system. The meeting will take place Nov. 22 at the Kingston Global Community Centre, 461 Princess Street, from 1:30 to 4:30 p.m., and again from 6 to 9 p.m. To receive a copy of the discussion document and to register, call (416) 326-1201.

Writer, director, actor and singer Djanet Sears will be scholar-in-residence in Victoria Hall Nov. 22-25. Sears is the writer of the stage play Afrika Solo, a radio adaptation of which took first prize at the International Major Armstrong Awards.

Her acting has earned her Dora nominations, and she is currently recording a solo album.

She will be available for informal discussion in the Scholar's Apartment, Victoria Hall, on Tuesday, Nov. 23 from 2:30-4:00 p.m.

Sears will also be giving a public lecture on Wednesday Nov. 24 at 8 p.m. in the Rotunda Theatre of Theological Hall.

Europa Europa survivor speaks

BY PAUL ZIMBALATTI
The Queen's Journal

Wednesday evening saw a packed Ellis Auditorium held spellbound by Salomon Perel, the subject of the critically acclaimed film Europa Europa.

After a showing of the Oscar-nominated film, Perel spoke of his experiences during World War II.

Perel, a Jew living in Germany, was separated from his family during the German invasion of Poland. The dramatic events that followed included time in a Soviet orphanage undergoing Communist indoctrination, a year of front-line action as a German soldier, and eventual membership in an elite academy for Hitler Youth.

His difficulties in concealing his Jewish background while maintaining his personal identity form the basis of the film.

"I would say 75 per cent [of the film] was true, and 25 per cent was freedom of art," estimated Perel.

The presentation attracted far more people than anticipated by the Alma Mater Society Speaker's Committee.

"We had no idea that there would be such a good turnout," commented Silvia Lulka, a representative of the Speaker's Committee, and co-president of Hillel.

She added that she was pleased by the unexpected crowd, a sentiment shared by Perel himself. "I was happy so many young people want to hear me," he said.

However, this large student turnout was nothing new for the speaker. He has recently attracted good audiences in several American universities, including Berkeley and Florida. After his engagement at Queen's, he will be speaking at Western, and then returning to Europe.

In his emotion-charged talk,

Salomon Perel speaks to a full house on Wednesday.

Brent Davis

Perel discussed the pain that his constant concealment of his Jewish heritage caused.

"In my body lived two souls; two extremely opposed souls," he explained. "Salomon Perel never wished to hide his real self, but on the other hand was the soul of Josef Peters, [his German pseudonym] an enthusiastic Hitler Youth."

Perel has lived in Israel since its formation after World War II.

An ardent supporter of the Jewish nation, he expressed his pleasure over the recent Palestinian resolution.

"Especially today I am happy because of the handshake of Rabin and Arafat," he said.

In response to a question from the audience asking what a young Jew should do to maintain his identity today, Perel laughed. "I have three words. Move to Israel."

New mayor visits Queen's campus

Matthews responds to students' concerns

BY LORI THORLAKSON
The Queen's Journal

Kingston Mayor Ken Matthews delivered his first public address at Queen's last Thursday, to defend himself against charges of sexism, and to introduce himself to students.

Matthews participated in a panel discussion at which Bobbi Spark of the Queen's Women's Centre challenged him to "discard biases and lead with dignity."

Jennifer Fielding of the Disabled Women's Network of Kingston also spoke to the crowd of approximately 50 students, gathered in the lower ceiling of the John Deutsch University Centre.

The panel discussion was organized by the Women's Centre at Queen's, to provide a forum for further discussion on sexual harassment and the concerns of disabled women in particular.

The issues were first raised after Matthews was quoted in the Whig-Standard, criticizing the legal action taken by a disabled woman who had been sexually harassed.

Matthews told students that he had been misquoted and the whole incident was "blown all out of proportion."

He explained that during a special city council meeting held to discuss the alleged remarks, he had said very little, on the advice of his lawyer. "I wanted to get it over with," he said.

Matthews told students that "I haven't been disabled, but I know the difficulties in that."

Describing himself as a "concerned, kind person," Matthews said that during his years on council representing the north end of Kingston, he "felt more like a social worker than an alderman."

He announced plans to create a mayor's committee on violence against women.

Matthews also promised to follow up on a request from the gay, lesbian, and bisexual community to have Kingston Police document violent offences based on sexual orientation, rather than classify such cases as general violent offences.

In response to the claim that he must voice the concerns of the whole community, Matthews said "I speak on what I think is right. I don't speak for the people, I speak for myself and I will get judged at the end by the polls."

Students submerge themselves in macaroni dinner

Cheesy event raises funds for Costa Rica project

BY SHELLEE FITZGERALD
The Queen's Journal

For many of us, macaroni and cheese is a fact of university life, along with stress and sleep deprivation. It's one of the staples that repeatedly makes its way into the bags we cart home from A&P.

Recently, however, two students moved beyond merely consuming it, and instead submerged themselves in a pool of it (632 boxes to be exact) for 33 hours.

This "Pretty Cheesy Event" was held Nov. 5 and 6 at the Kingston Centre shopping mall. It was an effort by participants Janna Graham (Arts '96) and Danielle Vaughan (a University of Waterloo student) to raise money for Youth Challenge International.

YCI is an international development program that promotes youth to become actively involved in responsible projects in Canada and abroad.

To participate in YCI's Project Costa Rica (which runs from Dec. 5 to March 1), Graham and Vaughan are required to personally raise $3,300. They had only $1,000 left to raise when they lowered themselves into the pasta pool.

Vaughan came up with the idea in August. "Fundraising is pretty cheesy anyway so we thought it would be perfect," she said.

After engaging in some experimentation, she learned that one box yielded three quarters of a litre of macaroni and cheese. "Just a little fact we learned along the way," she said.

Fortunately, local grocers donated the 632 boxes required to fill the pool.

"The response has been fantastic," said Graham, adding that the immediate reaction of onlookers was one of "yuk! ... but if you're willing to sit in it for that long we'll give you a few dollars."

This was precisely the reaction they were counting on, Graham and Vaughan were also pleased with the local media response, and the invaluable assistance provided by the Kingston Centre staff.

Both agreed that the experience was a positive one.

Vaughan added, "at least we're getting word out about YCI and that's important to us."

YCI's development programme extends to a number of countries, including Guyana and the Solomon Islands, but Graham and Vaughan were drawn to Project Costa Rica because of a fascination they hold for the country.

Graham explained that "what we hear about Costa Rica is usually limited to stories from people who have vacationed at the resorts. No one seems to know what else is going on down there, so we think it will be interesting to see what's beyond the beaches, and all the other things the country has to offer."

She added that "of the Latin American countries, Costa Rica is at the forefront of environmentalism, and that appeals to us."

The field project will allow the two to participate in important community service, environmental, and medical projects. The money they raise will be spent on the materials required in the implementation of these projects.

When asked if they would do it all again, Graham said, "yes, for money, especially if I had to raise $1,000 in only four weeks."

She added that, "although it's cold and it smells, it's actually more comfortable than you would think."

Will they be dining on macaroni and cheese soon? The response was an emphatic "no!"

More cheese please!

New centre for parents and children opens in JDUC

Parent Resource Centre seeks campus visibility

BY TARA ROY
The Queen's Journal

The Parent Resource Centre is a new resource on campus that many people, specifically parents, are not aware of.

The centre, located in the lower level of the John Deutsch University Centre, is a place parents can go with their children, and have a child entertained while the parent studies, relaxes with coffee or tea, or browses through pamphlets on childcare issues.

The original goal of the centre was to provide a place for parents to leave their children, while they ran errands or did homework on campus.

However, legalities wouldn't permit such a service, because formal training in early childcare is mandatory for all employees of such a centre, according to the centre's literature.

At a meeting of the Alma Mater Society Childcare Committee Tuesday, AMS President Katherine Phillips said that the money to pay such a person is not available, but this option is still being considered for the future.

The centre is therefore deemed a "drop-in" service, rather than "drop-off," because the parent must remain with their child.

Equipped with donated books, toys, stuffed animals, and brightly-painted murals, children are sure to be entertained.

According to June Blackburn, a mother and Queen's student, the centre has had problems making itself known to the people who would use it.

"I think a lot of parents aren't aware that it exists," she said, adding that she's been happy with the service she has received.

"It was great. The girl who was here was really nice," she said of her first visit.

Lisa Foran, chairperson of the AMS Childcare Committee, said that at the centre's Nov. 1 opening, "we ended up having coffee and donuts without a lot of parents."

Foran said, "our main concern over the last two weeks was just getting [the centre] open." The committee's present objective is to attract more parents into the centre, she said.

According to Foran, there has been some concern that the operating hours — of 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. every weekday — are not convenient for most parents. Hence, there is a possibility that the hours will be changed.

The committee is also looking into setting up events for the parents who use the centre, like a stress management seminar and a smoker at the Quiet Pub.

In addition to raising awareness about the Parent Resource Centre on campus, there is a call for more volunteers to staff the area. Those interested can stop by the centre in the lower ceiling of the JDUC.

MBA proposal questioned

Concerns about MBA representation on campus bodies, society events

BY SHARON WILSON
The Queen's Journal

A proposal to privatize the Queen's Master of Business Administration program has raised some concerns within the MBA Student Society.

Society President Adam Prusin said while he realizes "there is a definite need for change" to the MBA program, he does not necessarily agree with some of the finer points of the proposal.

Among the program changes in the proposal are an increase of tuition fees from $5,200 per year to $18,000, a change in the program's length — from two years to 12 months — and a drastic reduction in the number of MBA students from the current number of about 220 to 30.

With the program intensified, and fewer MBA students involved in the society, Prusin stressed, many of the services and events the MBA Student Society sponsors will be eliminated.

According to Prusin, there is more to being a Queen's MBA student than academics. "I value the full MBA experience as it is out of the classroom," he said, adding that the implementation of the new program may jeopardize extra-curricular involvement.

Currently, Prusin indicated, the MBA Student Society has a 26-person council, with each member of the council serving for two years.

The council plans such events as the MBA Games in January, in which teams of 20 from universities across Canada come to Queen's.

As well, the MBA Society also has representatives on the Senate and in the Alma Mater Society. With the reduction in faculty size, Prusin said, there is a possibility that such MBA student representation may disappear.

On the question of the proposal to concentrate the program's curriculum on science and technology, Prusin acknowledged that there are a lot of jobs in that area, but warned that it will attract a certain type of person and may be "closing the door to a lot of potential, excellent MBA [students]."

In terms of accessibility, and the new program's estimated $18,000 tuition fee, Prusin sees this as "no problem."

Prusin defended the high tuition fee, arguing that students would be saved costs if the program were one year instead of two. MBA grads would save a year's worth of rent and living expenses, he said, and would additionally have an extra year's wages since they could begin working earlier. The total savings would offset the $18,000 fee, he said.

Prusin said the new program is designed to compete not with "the Westerns, U of T's or Yorks, but [with] the best institutions in North America — the Chicagos, Harvards and Kelloggs."

He said tuition at schools like Harvard can cost as much as $40,000, and Canadians don't realize that the cost of a university education is significantly lower in Canada than it is in the U.S.

However, Prusin said that some MBA students are questioning how much of an affiliation with Queen's the new MBA school will have. He indicated that although it is not the program's intention, the MBA faculty may be "perceived as an outsider, elitist type of program."

Surface fate yet to be decided

port the funding of Surface without compromising its pledge to represent students.

Asked whether he felt the executive should have gone against the wishes of the student body, Lagtapon responded, "how about the other almost 50 per cent who voted Yes to Surface? Where's the accountability to them?"

To this, Steeves said that "as a student government we're not going to be able to address the concerns of everybody. We can try, and we do try, but in a referendum question such as this, we have to be bound by what the majority says."

Lagtapon said the referendum did not provide a conclusive enough result to warrant the demise of Surface, and cited the support shown for Surface at last year's ASUS annual general meeting, this year's special general meeting, and by Queen's campus media, as "overwhelming [evidence] that Surface must live."

Steeves said she is sticking to her commitment to listen to the student voice. "I honestly believe that this was a choice between student dictators and student leaders," she said.

But Lagtapon said acting on the referendum results contravenes the democratic rights of minorities.

"When you consider what [acting on the referendum] really means in a so-called democracy," he said, "it means that minorities will never have a voice."

Steeves said, "people voted against ASUS funding Surface, they didn't necessarily vote against the existence of the paper... I want the paper to exist, but I just don't feel ASUS can fund it."

Steeves suggested that although ASUS will no longer fund Surface, students could still start up a paper independently.

"One of the most important things to remember is that 900 people did vote in favour of Surface and a lot of them might be willing to contribute" to the start-up of a new paper, she said.

Steeves said interested students would have to "canvas the community and seek advertising," and conceded that the endeavour would take "time, effort and person-power" to accomplish.

Lagtapon told The Journal that while an independent paper is always an alternative, "we don't have the people and the resources to do that."

He expressed disappointment with his inability to introduce a compromise motion at last Thursday's special general meeting, the motion he proposed promised that if granted funding for the remainder of the school year, Surface would broaden "its critical base with regard to content" and furnish "a forum of positive discourse."

According to Lagtapon's proposal, the future funding of Surface would then become an opt-outable student fee at the end of this year.

However, because the special general meeting had lost quorum, the motion could not be introduced.

"I thought my compromise was reasonable because it took into account the animosity toward Surface," he said.

Surface supporter Mike Perry agreed. "Surface has come up with a compromise to which there's initially been a positive reaction, even by some of the No supporters. But this ASUS action [to strike Surface from the ASUS constitution] leaves no room for that," he said.

Lagtapon said he'd have difficulty introducing the motion at Thursday's meeting. "Well, it's kind of hard to, because they [the executive] set the tone, right? They're saying we want Surface struck out of the ASUS constitution... they don't want it to survive anymore."

However, Steeves said that "if [Lagtapon] chose to bring the motion, Assembly would discuss it and there would also be a vote - we are not closing him out of assembly, he's completely welcome to come and bring forward any motion."

At the special general meeting held last Thursday, motions were introduced to make referenda binding. The first motion read: "That ASUS assembly, beginning in the 1993-1994 academic year, is bound by all referendum results." This motion, which would have made

AMS commissioner/executive conflict to be mediated

BY BROCK MARTLAND
The Queen's Journal

In the wake of recent complaints from three commissioners, the Alma Mater Society will be using a mediator to work through internal problems.

The problems were raised at AMS Assembly on Oct. 28, with criticism aimed primarily at the executive, from Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin, Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell, and Academic Affairs Commissioner Taz Pirmohamed.

The commissioners and executive began meeting today with the mediator, Sandy Cotton, a business professor. The suggestion to use Cotton was made by Main Campus Residents Council President Warren Flannery at the Assembly meeting.

AMS President Katherine Philips said that the actual resolution of the conflict is the responsibility of the parties involved. "I don't think the mediator wants to be the resolver [of the dispute]. He'll be able to bring the problems to discussion," she said.

Philips said that "the mediator is not solving the problem. The mediator is bringing the problem into workable discussion, and being the chair of the meetings."

Nevin expressed some optimism about the mediation process. When asked if the mediator would be successful in resolving difficulties, she said, "I hope so, but it will be a long process. Fortunately everybody is very keen."

Mitchell said that mediation is "almost necessary at this point, because there's so much stuff from the past that we can't go forward at

Proper role of campus media services disputed

She said the AMS should "not act in a censorship role."

I won't deny that there are accountability problems with The Journal, Nevin commented, "but that is a separate issue... don't make The Journal a mouthpiece for the AMS."

Journal Editor-in-Chief Sarah MacWhirter said that for years The Journal has been seen as a mouthpiece of the AMS.

"Jabal's statement proves this is not the case," she said.

She said that Jabal's statements pose a serious threat to the editorial autonomy of The Journal.

"As Media Services Director, he should act simply as a liaison between The Journal and the AMS. Yes, since day one he has consistently tried to exert control over both the business side and the editorial side of The Journal. He has tried to make decisions that can

Senate decision hurts all students...but one

What is an adequate punishment for someone who sexually assaults another human being while that person is unconscious? Who should be involved in making that decision? Can a crime of that cowardly magnitude ever be compensated for?

Sexual assault is not simply a violent assault. While victims of physical assault do live in fear and do suffer psychological damage as well, sexual assault is a crime that permeates every aspect of one's life. A woman who is sexually assaulted goes through feelings of shame, self-degradation, guilt, fear, and then, if she's lucky, anger.

Most women who are sexually assaulted never report the crime. Realistically, there is little within the legal system a woman can do to confront her attacker. Although improvements are being made, a woman who attempts to take her attacker to court often finds herself fighting against and being degraded by those who ought to be protecting and fighting for her.

Only a non-threatening legal system which is aware of problems like sexual assault, and the devastating effects it has on its victims, offers a viable alternative to women who have been sexually assaulted.

The Alma Mater Society Judicial Committee offers such a system. Unfortunately, its authority and legitimacy is being unfairly undermined by our University Senate.

Because of the informal nature with which it operates, some may think that decisions made by the Judicial Committee need not be treated with the gravity they deserve. This seems to be the case with the Senate.

The Judicial Committee exercises jurisdiction over any matter of inappropriate behaviour, involving undergraduate students, which adversely affects the interests and responsibilities of the university community. The committee is composed of seven students, two of whom are from the faculty of law. Any appeals to decisions made by the committee must be taken to the Senate Grievance Board within two weeks of notification of the decision.

Decisions made by the Judicial Committee are passed through Senate regardless of whether or not an appeal is filed. However, in the past, Senate has taken no interest whatsoever in what or how the decisions are made, and has left the committee to fulfill its role within the Queen's community.

Now this situation has changed.

In January of this year, a female student was sexually assaulted by a male student while she was unconscious. She brought a complaint to the Judicial Committee, and hearings were held in March. The accused plead guilty to the charges. The AMS prosecutor and the attacker's lawyer agreed to a statement of facts. They also agreed on a joint recommendation for a three-year suspension.

The Judicial Committee decided that because the assault was very serious, and because the female student wished to continue her studies at Queen's without fear of the attacker, the suspension should be extended to seven years.

The committee maintains that is a court for students composed of students. It is a court capable of understanding issues that students face. It is a court capable of understanding the effects of a particular crime on a student's life.

The process not penalty line of argument is inconsistent with the way the committee works. Often the committee brings forth decisions weighing in on either side of the recommendations made by both parties' lawyers. Senate has never before concerned itself with decisions of the same nature.

Perhaps Senate should concern itself with such questions, but doing so in this manner seriously threatens the ability of the Judicial Committee to perform the functions for which it was created.

Especially because the assailant did not appeal the committee's decision, the Senate's actions are appalling out of line. Perhaps the original three-year suspension should never have been agreed to, but perhaps the female student had not communicated her desire to continue studies at Queen's beyond her undergraduate years. The Senate's decision will force AMS prosecutors in the future to push for the longest or most serious punishment possible. More importantly, the Judicial Committee has been seriously undermined by a vote with only a 52 per cent majority.

Had only one Senate member voted the other way the decision would have resulted in a tie. How could Senate threaten the authority of the Judicial Committee with only one vote? How could Senate take such an action period?

In the end, and most importantly, all Queen's students have suffered because of Senate's actions. One in particular suffers more. And only one gains - the male student who admitted to sexually assaulting an unconscious female student.

The Judicial Committee, however, is not your ordinary court. It

The Gloom and the Glory

our society still have a long way to go.

The referendum process at Queen's appears to have become an opinion poll. Despite a 73 per cent rejection of a proposed name change to the Faculty of Applied Science by students, the Engineering Society plans to go ahead with it. The decision to disregard the engineering students vote and add "Engineering" to the official name of the faculty has illustrated the pointlessness of the referendum. This unfortunately sets up the possibility to use referendum results only when it suits the personal purposes of the administration or representatives. Unwanted results can be overlooked. If this is to be the case, then the process of putting questions to students should be called what it is - an opinion poll.

Criminal activity makes everyone suffer. Because someone decided they needed an industrial strength vacuum cleaner and was not willing to pay for it, Mackintosh-Corry will be closed at night. This heinous crime leaves the studios night owls and nocturnal social butterflies with very few places to go. For those people, The Journal wishes them good luck. For those who stole the vacuum cleaner, smarten up!

The referendum power of the Ontario University Students Association has been significantly bolstered by Brock University and the University of Western Ontario, who recently officially joined the association. The viability of OUSA was in question because of lack of commitment from these schools.

Queen's students, it now appears, belong to a strong alternative to the Ontario Federation of Students (who advocate zero-tuition).

Despite this year's shortened football season for Queen's, other Golden Gaels have come up big. Competing against larger schools with lower admission standards has not prevented Queen's athletes from succeeding. The Golden Gaels rugby team recaptured the OUA title this season making it their seventh victory in eight years. The men's soccer team is off to the CIAU championship after claiming first place in the OUA. It is their first title since 1975. The women's tennis team also displayed their prowess after finishing first in both the singles and doubles categories. Three cheers for the Golden Gaels.

Marriott Union Defended

The Editor,

I would like to respond to a series of letters in The Journal regarding the part-time workers at Marriott Food Services and their move to organize themselves into a labour union. The main goal, but by no means the only goal, of the union contract negotiations is to acquire equal pay for equal work. Full-time cafeteria help earn approximately $11.44 per hour, while part-timers doing exactly the same work earn $6.45 per hour. The low wages of part-time workers exploits these people, many of whom are students, single mothers, and older workers.

In Heather Moore's two letters to The Journal, she wished to express her personal feelings about Marriott management, not about the union or aspects of the negotiations. Her satisfaction with her job says nothing about the position of the workers that she supervises. She feels that the Marriott managers at Queen's have somehow been treated unfairly by workers. Why? Because these workers have found it necessary to unionize in order to achieve better pay and working conditions from the Marriott Corporation. For her information, contract negotiations will involve representatives of the union and the Marriott Corporation. Certain local managers may play a minor role, but lawyers from Marriott headquarters will likely do the hard bargaining. Local managers and supervisors are not being harmed by the union; they will still have their jobs and higher pay after a settlement is reached. Whether or not nice things can be said about Marriott managers at Queen's is irrelevant.

I take great offense to Ms. Moore's comment in her letter "Marriott Defended", that people were somehow coerced into supporting the union. This union is a voluntary organization committed to the betterment of conditions for all workers. With a union contract for part-timers, the full-timers will no longer be implicitly threatened by Marriott's option to hire more part-time people to work for half as much money with no job security or benefits. With successful negotiations for a first contract, even Ms. Moore will receive a wage increase unless Marriott feels it should pay its supervisors less than its workers.

Workers who support the union are not, in my opinion, trying to deny problems in the work setting, such as inappropriate behaviour by both management and workers, but rather are trying to establish a fair way of addressing these problems. The point of the first article in The Journal, "Caf Workers Unionize", was to call attention to the real fear of workers, that if they complain about unfair working conditions they may lose their jobs. A proper grievance clause in a union part-time contract would be a fair way of dealing with the issues raised in this article and by Ms. Moore.

The real issue that we as students should address is whether or not it is appropriate for Queen's Administration and ourselves to ignore the fact that a multi-national corporation is unduly exploiting the people who work to feed us. The money we pay to Marriott at Queen's grosses approximately $12 million each year. (Exact figures are not public because the university is exempted from the Freedom of Information Act in this matter) According to Fortune Business Reports, 1992, the Marriott Corporation itself had gross sales of $8.7 billion dollars, with a net income of $85 million. It has been numbered as 118th among the Fortune 500. I am fairly confident that there is enough money there that some could be utilized for the benefit of workers. A decent standard of living for the average Canadians who work for this corporation seems only just, considering the amount of business and wealth that this corporation acquires at Queen's.

Support for Surface

The Editor,

Robin Kelsey's recent letter to the editor advocates Surface's "accountability." The ASUS executive likes this idea too. However, what about being accountable to the 44.4% who voted to keep Surface? Majority rule is not the only form of democracy. A referendum question like "Do you support the banning of all visible minorities from participating on committees?" would not be allowed even if it was the will of 90%. The ASUS executive would not talk about "accountability" then. The majority must be made to support minorities - whether it is a matter of fundamental rights (like voting) or simply of having a voice (Surface).

Considering we have The Journal and Golden Words, we must also have a minority paper. Some may argue that such a paper would be better suited under the AMS. Perhaps, but I like comedy and I am not an Engineering student. Does that mean Golden Words would be better suited under the AMS? Isn't it okay for the humorous paper we all enjoy to be funded only by Engineering students and for the minority paper non-ArtsSci minorities also enjoy to be funded by ArtsSci students? What is the point of creating a Journal II under ASUS? People fighting for Surface are being practical. We don't want to restructure all campus papers and risk losing Surface. Right now Surface happens to be under ASUS. So, it is there that we will fight for it.

Kelsey also argues that Surface claimed to represent Arts and Science students. The truth is that it has never claimed to be mainstream. Also, don't believe those who claim it offends minorities. We may have been offended by some specific articles (I didn't like Iron Lotus either) but that doesn't mean we disagree with the idea of a minority paper! Don't believe those who claim to know that Surface will go back to the way it was either. Last year's editors are gone.

Queen's First Aid Unit misunderstood

The Editor,

I am writing to remind the Queen's students that the members of the Queen's First Aid Unit are volunteers. I would also like to point out that we are not all Meds keepers trying to fatten our resumes. There is a good representation from Arts, Science, Nursing, Con-Ed, Applied Science, and Phys-Ed. Our 38 members are dedicated student volunteers offering first aid knowledge and experience at outdoor intramural events, home football games, Orientation Week, Alumni Weekend and Convocation ceremonies. Our purpose is to treat injuries as they occur, and to provide follow-up transportation if necessary by calling the Queen's Emergency Report Centre on our radios.

So far this year, Queen's First Aid has provided over 1500 hours of volunteer service. We have treated over 100 injuries, from sprained ankles to a land spinal. We have sent ten of these to receive further medical attention.

As a division of St. John Ambulance, we are part of an international organization providing a consistent standard of training. The Queen's division is generally responsible for covering events on campus.

It can get very cold on Tindall Field, sitting for two hours watching other people run around. A lot of people have approached the unit members asking us how much we get paid an hour, and after our response they express their gratitude for our efforts. Please pass this information on to your teammates and neighbours.

Our red jackets are distinctive even when we're not covering events, and our visibility has increased greatly over the past few years. We have two recruiting sessions each year to replace outgoing members, and the quality and quantity of the applications are both escalating swiftly. In October, we had 57 applicants for 8 spots. We have increased the size of the unit to try to accommodate the demand, but unfortunately, to maintain a cohesive unit, we can't accept everybody who applies.

I would like to thank all members of Queen's First Aid for providing their time and services for the past few months. I would also like to acknowledge the interest expressed by several other students and to encourage them to apply again in February.

AMS apologizes

The Editor,

Last Thursday at AMS Assembly, a number of concerns were brought forward by three members of the AMS Council. Some of these concerns have been discussed in the past but obviously were not resolved satisfactorily. We, the Executive, want to publicly apologize for any lack of support that Council members have felt, but more importantly, make a strong commitment toward resolving inter-relational conflicts within the Council.

When we were interviewing students for the Commissioner and Director positions, we were fortunate enough to find eight highly skilled people with great ideas and the initiative to contribute positively to the life and work at the AMS. Perhaps in making our own project priorities, we expected that the Council members would carry out their responsibilities with reasonable autonomy. Although everyone has been doing a fantastic job, we have realized that we need to be more supportive on an ongoing basis. We have been concentrating on our individual priorities and consequently have not been successful in recognizing and acting upon the needs of all Council members.

Where do we go from here? We owe it to the students to ensure that the Council is working effectively in the future months and will make it a priority. We will be meeting as a group as well as consulting with advisors on group relations. The Council provides the backbone of the AMS. Their work is essential and we have been negligent in actively appreciating what they do. It is our hope that recent events can be used as an opportunity for all of us to work towards a solution.

International complaints

The Editor,

On the weekend of October 29th-31st Queen's was fortunate enough to hold a conference on ASIA in the 90s, sponsored by SNID. I was impressed that Queen's was beginning to open its academic mind and expand its interaction with the rest of the world.

Professor J. Lele of the Political Studies department with a handful of assistants pulled off a great conference. We had participants from India, Malaysia, Philippines, Korea, and many more. It was an intellectual feast. However, the University Administration did not support this conference financially. Small and large individual faculties made contributions, but the principal's office did not contribute any funds - not even from its development fund! On one hand, Queen's is trying to promote itself as an internationally sensitive institution and at the same time it will not support an international conference on its own campus. As an international student, I have always felt that this university is limited in its international curriculum and outlook in general. Now with this kind of lack of support from the head of the University administration I personally feel let down.

International students are Queen's link to the rest of the world and the potential international students of the future. We are your ambassadors. The very least Queen's can do is respect and acknowledge us by supporting events of international vision on campus.

Press Time: A History of Student Publications at Queen's

One hundred and twenty years ago last month, this university's first newspaper came off the press and into the hands of Queen's students. Since then, Queen's has been fertile ground for new publications, catering to desires for new and better coverage of news, ideas, and opinions.

The following is by no means a comprehensive look at the history of all of this campus's newspapers, but it should provide a cursory view of events of yesterday.

On October 25, 1873, an eight-page Queen's College Journal came to Queen's, the entire front page covered in rather bad poetry. Page two carried a large article titled "Meditations on Food: Historic, Aesthetic, and General," which was continued in subsequent issues.

Page four gives us the Prospectus of The Journal: "Its object shall be two-fold. Firstly - to foster a literary taste among the Students, and to afford them an opportunity of giving expression to their opinions on the leading topics of the day. It is also intended to serve as a bond of union between the University and her Alumni and to sustain the interest of the latter in the properity of their Alma Mater, after they have left her halls."

A subscription to The Journal cost 50 cents a year, in advance, for seven months of the bi-weekly publication.

The paper also listed among its aims a desire to foster journalism skills at Queen's, and to supply information to "intelligent readers."

The news section informs the reader of cuts in government grants to the College, and makes an appeal to students for funds. It also thanked students for previous contributions of $13,000.

By the turn of the century, The Journal included news coverage, political commentary, society news, and social events. Few major changes happened at The Journal over the years; however, one can see a steady progression over the last century to the form we have today.

The November 14, 1939 issue is an example of a typical edition of The Journal. At the time, Canada was at war, and The Journal was publishing on Tuesdays and Fridays. The entertainment section reviewed the new movie The Wizard of Oz, the front page mourned a football loss to the Western Mustangs, and a letter to the editor warned students not to get caught up in the war propaganda.

Controversy has not eluded The Journal over the years. Last year a grievance was filed against the paper for printing a first-year student's homophobic comments under the pseudonym "Bart."

Another grievance, filed by a group of concerned Muslim students, alleged that The Journal had displayed "a discriminatory pattern of editorial policy toward Muslims and Middle Eastern Issues."

Golden Words

Golden Words started publishing on January 24, 1967, as the Engineering Society newspaper. It was to be "a supplement to The Journal," covering EngSoc news. It is interesting that it was initially not a humour paper; it didn't acquire that image until several years later.

On the third page of issue One was an article that started, "The Engineer's image - a fun-loving, hard drinking, anti-intellectual. Everybody talks about it, the artsmen scorn it, the faculty tries to forget it...and we perpetuate it!"

Strangely enough, the article seriously exhorts the engineers to clean up their image.

In issue Three, the editors joked about the new Engineering jackets, to be made of leather. Everyone was either amused or angry about the change. One GW cartoon portrayed Elvis Presley being fitted for an Applied Science jacket.

Throughout the early years, Golden Words quickly expanded, adopting some humour, although still doing such pieces as music reviews, and even hinting at printing poetry.

By the mid-seventies, modern-day features such as "A Few Quacks from Duck" began appearing, as well as graphics like the hippo and the airship. The content started to get humorous, but was also explicit at times. Topics included mostly beer, sex, and violence.

By the mid-eighties, Golden Words had taken on a form close to that of today. They had adopted the slogan "Sola veritas est qui facit ut me in merda," and the masthead's "Canada's Other National Newspaper." They also began their famous spoofs of other campus publications, such as The Licker of March 5, 1986.

Controversies surrounding the content of GW included instances such as a letter from the administration condemning the paper for printing a "Hey, shit happens" in very large type on the cover of a Sept 1988 issue. The following issue made no mention of the letter, but simply printed the phrase "What the fuck is going on?" in even larger type.

A more recent controversy revolved around the publication of a cartoon in the Sept. 16, 1992 issue which referred to the firing of three AMS staff as "the moral equivalent of firing a single black mother of five during the Christmas Season."

The cartoon prompted criticism by Liz Muggah, former AMS vice-president (university affairs), who said that the cartoon was "absolutely unacceptable - it's racist and sexist." de Villa defended his work, saying he never intended to be offensive, but apologized "as a sign of good will and good faith."

The magazines of Queen's

The Journal started publishing its magazine as Sveven, on Oct 7, 1970. Although the name may sound silly to us today, the editor chose it for its sound. The Middle English word means "a dream."

The publication started on newsprint, occasionally in colour. Editorial content included environmental and social issues, as well as fiction, poetry, and photography.

In December 1971, the publication's comments on current affairs and life in Kingston.

The first issue of The Queen's Journal Magazine, which followed Sveven, was printed in November 1979. The first issue outlined the purpose of a magazine as distinct from that of a newspaper. Newspapers cover news, the editorial said, and leave little room for creativity. "But a magazine, somewhat less restricted by the constant arrival of deadlines, can be more concerned with the magazine became "financially self-sufficient and editorially independent," according to the last editor of the Queen's Journal Magazine.

The Conduit carried the subheading "Queen's University Magazine," as opposed to the "Queen's Journal Magazine." It nevertheless carried on in the traditions of its predecessors, until it was discontinued in 1987. Time Out, a new magazine, took over from where The Conduit left off, with renewed zeal, although published by the same people with essentially the same mission. Time Out carried on until 1992, when it was finally cancelled for financial reasons.

David G. Postill, the Director of Media Services, drafted a lengthy letter, dated Feb 11, 1992, explaining his position on Time Out. After going through several reasons for either keeping the magazine of the magazine of the

magazine of the

magazine of the name changed to the third eye. The editors admitted that the magazine "[was] not a 'professional' magazine, nor [did] it have any pretensions to becoming such a publication." Their main purpose was "to provide the Queen's University Community with an outlet for its creative work." The following year, the name was changed back to Sveven.

By 1978, the magazine was being printed in letter-size format, with a glossy cover. Content included literary reviews, fiction, and poetry, as well as entertaining and provoking the reader, using good writing and eye-catching layouts.

The Queen's Journal Magazine ran under that name until 1983, when it was severed from The Journal, and given a new name, The Conduit. This change was motivated by a desire to gain autonomy from The Journal and run the magazine under an independent budget.

Students voted in favour of financing the magazine in a February 1983 referendum. For the first time in its history,

The Lictor

Those of you who have been around longer than I have may remember Surface's predecessor, The Lictor.

The Lictor first came out on Oct. 5, 1973, "Published Occasionally Under the Auspices of ASUS." The name, interestingly enough, comes from classical Rome: "A lictor was an attendant to a Roman Magistrate," page one of the first issue points out. In essence, this lictor was to be a protector of the establishment against any common citizens who got too close. One wonders why that name was chosen, then the paper was intended to be "a forum of ideas and opinions."

A picture of a battle axe adorns the masthead; it was the symbol of the lictor's office.

"In October 1973," said Mary Bloos in the first issue, "as I survey the present context of students at Queen's, I can find no matters pressing their way to the forefront of student discussion." Times certainly have changed.

The Lictor definitely had its ups and downs in terms of production quality. In 1973-74 they used a four-page letter press format, the following year they were up to eight pages, and a year later it was back to four. In 1976, for some reason, the paper reverted to using a typewriter for final copy. Numbers of issues went from five per year in volume three, to the "sometimes weekly" of volume four, and anywhere in between.

In terms of student politics, The Lictor started out very gently, and then grew more progressive in its publishing of opinions and ideas.

Prominent topics in the mid-seventies included socialism, feminism, and the Third World, as well as many other campus issues. Articles from 1975 included one on immigration, another on feminism, one on racial discrimination, and a satire on capitalism. The latter story covered the supposed creation of a "Status Quo Club" at Queen's.

By 1977 The Lictor was publishing as many as 20 pages per issue, and becoming increasingly political.

In 1978, The Lictor focused even more on opinion articles and letters. The opinions were on interesting political and social issues of the day, but were not remotely radical by today's standards. The publication ran opinion articles, poetry, updates on Kingston entertainment, social issues, and faculty issues.

Each issue tended to have a central theme, and the editors concentrated on gathering any and all opinions. The only major controversy of the time came in December 1980, when editor Ellen Massey was asked to leave, and even then she stepped down voluntarily.

The Lictor's final issue came on March 24, 1988, and carried an editorial by the new editor, Gordon Laird. Although no mention was made of Surface, Laird did hint at coming changes, because of instability and some attacks from the Left.

The editorial took a refreshingly in-depth look at campus journalism, and makes some wise observations. "Campus publications spend a lot of time talking about themselves... A lot of talk goes on about things like 'purpose,' 'profit,' 'quality' and the like."

"One could describe such discussion as a veiled display of vanity," Laird went on to use the metaphor of "a small beauty pageant whose contestants wield megaphones and speak in paragraphs."

"The ability/possibility of the publication," he said, "to bring together different views, disciplines and genres in a format that is accessible by both reader and writer is indeed a rare thing."

Craig Martin is a second-year history student who has no qualms about introducing himself.

Surface

The first volume of Surface was clearly an Arts newspaper, as opposed to one concentrating on minority views. The first issue, for example, featured articles on the Shuffle Demons, an interview with W. O. Mitchell, and an article on how the city perceives students. It also printed a photo spread of Frosh Week.

In its early days, when Surface was just taking over from The Lictor, it was a fairly large newspaper. Music and film reviews took up several pages. The second issue had some criticism of homophobia, but, for the most part, Surface stayed subdued in its opinions of such issues as gender, race, and sexuality. They maintained the slogan "to bring into public view," but editorial goals and standards were different than those of today.

They maintained the slogan "to bring into public view," but editorial goals and standards were different than those of today.

On Thursday, Oct. 29, 1991, The Journal reported on the controversy surrounding an article in the Oct. 24th issue of Surface, "A message from the Queen." The "Message" told Queen's students that, "yes, we think all strafe men are rapists (and dead men don't rape again)."

In another article, an obviously upset student used the now-infa-minority views on issues such as sexism, racism and homophobia. Surface began publishing pieces that reflected the anger and resentment of marginalized groups, but which tended to shock otherwise complacent Queen's students.

Students responded immediately. Surface received 15 complaints, and both ASUS and the AMS also received complaints. "The Queen" also upset Christians with the phrase, "Jesus was a flaming faggot."

Lara Hendi (Arts '92), one of the complainants, commented that Surface writers "want people to respect their cause, but they seem to be just breeding more hatred...."

Marc Jones, a member of the Surface editorial board, failed "to see how a majority can be marginalized by an author who cannot even use his real name for fear of violence."

Supporters of Surface argued that even if some of the pieces in the paper were disturbing to the mainstream students of Queen's, it was important to make students aware of issues such as sexism, racism and homophobia through

"[I fail] to see how a majority can be marginalized by an author who cannot even use his real name for fear of violence."

whatever means.

Since the controversy has erupted, Surface has faced repeated attacks by students unwilling to support a progressive paper through ASUS funds. The debate over Surface has encompassed issues such as minority rights, freedom of expression, and journalistic accountability. The controversy culminated in a referendum this fall, in which students voted by a nine per cent margin. Following constitutional wrangling in ASUS Assembly, Surface will not be funded by ASUS this year.

INQ

Anybody who was on campus last year will remember an ambitious new project called INQ: The Independent News of Queen's. Every Thursday, starting on January 28, 11,000 copies of the paper were dropped on campus and in area stores. Before its chairman was arrested in June, cutting off its assets, the paper had accumulated a staff of 57.

INQ was an attempt to establish a newspaper independent of the Queen's community. It diversified coverage to include international and national news and sports, but since it was only issued once a week, these items were rarely "news" to the majority of Queen's students.

INQ was a lesson in risk. The first issue carried a large bold editorial, entitled "Dare to Dream." Chairman John Dillman wrote an article on the possibilities for a new journalistic project, covering campus, city, and world news. The staff was inspired, but few others were.

The paper, founded by John Dillman and Bart Anders Eiriksson, was an initiative begun in 1992, based on a desire for a greater Christian presence in campus media. Brian Lim, a friend of Eiriksson, started work on a group called "Christians in Media." He began working with Eiriksson on a vision for either a greater presence in The Journal, or an entirely new project.

In June of this year, The Whig Standard reported that John Dillman had been arrested on 27 charges of fraud against the Canadian Cancer Society derway for the establishment of a new paper. From the very beginning, plans for The Independent News of Queen's were ambitious. Dillman had some innovative visions for where the paper could go, and how to finance it. These included selling fresh lobsters and security alarms, and running a mail service.

Through their three months of publication, INQ progressed quickly from a small black and white paper of 24 pages, to a colour broadsheet. Nevertheless, INQ sufferred from an inability to stimulate the interests of Queen's students.

In June of this year, The Whig Standard reported that John Dillman had been arrested on 27 charges of fraud against the Canadian Cancer Society. His financing of INQ had been a mystery from the beginning, and had led to the editor's resignation two weeks prior to the arrest. Dillman's arrest left more than 50 Queen's students out of work over the summer. INQ's former employees are still waiting for labour board compensation.

Ironically, the April 29 issue of INQ, the last one in the archives, carried a front-page headline, "Looking for a Summer Job?," and informed the reader that upcoming issues would "feature articles on job search skills...."

Soccer banner on penalties

Gaels challenge for national crown

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

What a roll! Is this team hot or what?!

Soler power fuels Gaels
The Queen's Golden Gaels men's soccer team won their first OUAA title since 1975, 2-1 in overtime over Western, in dramatic fashion at Richardson Stadium last Sunday.

The Gaels triumphed when Jon Soler converted a sudden-death penalty kick, and the Mustangs could not respond. The teams had been tied 1-1 at the end of the regulation 90 minutes — Nick Thomas scored the only Queen's goal on a first-half penalty. Two scoreless ten-minute overtime periods followed. Next came a five-shot penalty shoot-out, which ended 3-3, setting the stage for Soler's banner-winning shot.

The win extended the Gaels' unbeaten streak to ten games, of which seven have been shutouts. They have conceded only four regulation goals in their last eight games. Rookie goaltender Liam Stevenson has been sensational during this stretch, and he has been ably supported by solid defensive play from the entire team.

CIAU's next

Queen's now advances to the CIAU championships at Acadia University in Wolfville, Nova Scotia this weekend. As OUAA East champions, they would have done so regardless of Sunday's result, on the strength of their 2-0 overtime win last Wednesday over the University of Toronto Varsity Blues in Hogtown.

In that game, the teams were scoreless at the end of regulation time. Queen's relied on their stout defense and tenacious midfield to run the Blues ragged, but to no immediate avail. Missed opportunities on both sides were the story of the first 90 minutes.

In overtime, the Gaels' superior fitness finally told. Striker Ken Butler found the mark on a dipping volley with the second half of extra time just underway. Queen's then sealed the Blues' fate with a fantastic run-and-strike by Dan Cheney.

The Gaels were familiar with dramatic extra-time victories, following their first-round win over regular-season champion Carleton Ravens in Ottawa. Scoreless after regulation and overtime, that game was decided by Liam Stevenson's heroics and Rich "cool as ice" Price's poise under the pressure of penalty shoot-outs.

Three games in three days

At the CIAU's, the Gaels have been placed into a three-team pool with Atlantic champ St. Francis Xavier and Quebec winner Sherbrooke. It's a round-robin format for each of the two pools, with the gold and bronze medal games on Sunday. Queen's definitely drew the short schedule straw. Today at noon local time, the Gaels meet St. F.X., while tomorrow at 9 a.m., Queen's tackles Sherbrooke.

That's less than 24 hours between matches, and Sherbrooke will have had more than 48 hours to prepare after their Thursday game with St. F.X. Queen's head coach John Walker Sr. was guarded in his assessment of the tournament's organization. "It's medically unsafe to play two games in less than 24 hours," Walker said. "But what can we do about it now? If we make it to Sunday, for either the gold or bronze medal games, it will be three games in less than 48 hours."

Queen's has suffered injuries to two key players in recent games. In the Toronto game, the Gaels lost OUAA All-Star stopper Brendan Johnson for the season. On Sunday, Dan Cheney went down, and according to coach Walker, Cheney is very doubtful for the CIAU's. With so much action in such a short time, depth could be a problem for Queen's. When assessing the Gaels' chances, Walker was cautiously optimistic. "We're a young team, still fairly inexperienced. If we give it everything we have, we should be competitive."

According to Walker, UBC, which is in the other pool, should be the favourite. The Acadia field is in fine shape, and weather conditions are good, with the forecast calling for temperatures of about seven degrees. It could have been snow.

Along with Johnson, defender and honourable correspondent Marc Labron was also selected to the OUAA East All-Star team.

Gaels regain rugby trophy for 7th win in eight years

BY HACK WILSON
The Queen's Journal

Pop your champagne and blow your whistles; the Queen's Golden Gaels have done it again, winning a championship for the seventh time in eight years. This marks the second championship (first of the weekend) that the Gaels' have won in the 1993-94 school year. Fitting that rugby (victories taken for granted from '86 to '91) avenged last year's one point loss to McMaster against little ol' Western.

It all happened last Saturday, when Queen's hosted the delightful Mustangs to a good ol' fashioned tea party. Hell's Angels style. Western pranced in, with glazed eyes and bad breath, and they waddled out bloated having received a sound 18-15 thrashing.

The first half was tense for both sides, fans included. Queen's had a try and a converted penalty, both scored by Steven Pettigrew. This gave the Gaels 8 points, the problem was that Western managed to score 9.

After a rejuvenating half-time rallying cry spurred on by coach Anderson, the Gaels stormed the field and turned the Mustangs into fillies.

Second half action saw Kevin O'Shea cross the line and Gareth Pettigrew convert the try — Gareth also successfully kicked a penalty this half — to make the final Queen's tally 18. As Western came up three points short, this left the Gaels' smoking cigars and singing songs (much to the glee of the Allie's staff who haven't had that much fun since the student constable smoker).

In other rugby action, the seconds destroyed Carleton 28-0. Two tries were scored by 'Big' Pete Jakes. This victory also gives the seconds seven victories in the last eight years.

Congratulations to the Queen's rugby club for their athletic prowess.

[Eds. Note: Stay tuned next week for the rugby year in review!]

Double trouble for hockey Gaels in weekend double header

BY ANDREW TURNER
and ANDRE NOWAKOWSKI
The Queen's Journal

Last weekend, the men's hockey Gaels were defeated twice on home ice. The first loss came at the hands of the visiting York Yeomen on Saturday afternoon with a 6-4 score, the second to the Badgers from Brock University on Sunday 7-2. Although Queen's came up with spirited efforts on both occasions, they came away from the weekend empty-handed.

York 6, Gaels 4

On Saturday, the fortunes of the Gaels were set early as Jamie Dinsmore was ejected from the game at 7:49 of the first period for checking from behind. While the Gaels held the momentum in the first period, penalties and missed opportunities kept them off the scoreboard for the first twenty minutes.

The Gaels' momentum continued into the second period and the pressure finally paid off as Jeff Gosselin banged in a rebound on the power play after a scramble in front of the net at 5:05 of the period. After York tied the game up just over a minute later, Dan Brown put Queen's ahead with a great wrist shot from high in the slot.

The Gaels went up by two when Kenny Robbins fought off a defender in front of the net to flip home Kenneth Ronson's rebound. The Yeomen began to show cheap tactics of spearing and verbal taunting to frustrate the

BEWIC: Innertube Waterpolo

BY BEWIC SPORTS OAYS STAFF
The Queen's Journal

In the next four issues of The Journal, we will highlight the four sports that are offered in BEWIC Sports Days — Innertube Waterpolo, Rugby Basketball, Volleyball and Broomball.

First, just a few words about how the BEWIC Sports Days weekend is organized. Each sport played over the two day period runs in a 32-team schedule format, featuring 63 games per sport and a minimum of three games per team. After the first two rounds are completed, three pools of play are formed. A-pool represents the teams that keep on winning. The B-pool is comprised of teams with one loss and the C-pool is those teams with 2 losses. After these initial two rounds, any team losing a game, regardless of what pool they are in, is eliminated from the tournament in that sport.

Innertube waterpolo is an annual favourite at BEWIC Sports Days. If you are unfamiliar with the game, its name tells you almost all you need to know! It's waterpolo played in innertubes! The tubes serve to equalize the skills of participants and add a major element to the game — FUN! (True advocates of waterpolo insist that this is a different game altogether than the real thing, but this is neither the time nor place to debate that point.) The tubes provide a "zone" between players, reducing the amount of contact that can go on in a game. The tubes also add a requirement for a sense of balance. You can't play the game if you are not in your tube!

Over the past several years, one team which has been a perennial favourite to challenge for the crown of BEWIC Sports Days Innertube Champs is SCILHOCLCA. 'Scilo' emerged on the scene about four years ago and immediately became a force to be reckoned with. They are the reigning 1993 champions, a title they successfully defended from 1992, and were also the 1991 A-pool finalists. Look for Sciloho-cla to be strong in the pool once again this year.

The other teams achieving notable status in the pool in the 1993 BSD event were:
A Champs — SCILHOCLCA
A Finalists — CON ED
B Champs — THE DREAM TEAM
B Finalists — PHE '93
C Champs — STILL HERE!
C Finalists — EDUCATION
Innertube is LOTS of FUN and an easy game to play. So take the plunge! Get wet and have fun!

Gaels run at Nationals

BY JASON LEWIS
The Queen's Journal

The Queen's Cross-Country teams acquitted themselves admirably this past weekend in Halifax, Nova Scotia. Not only did both teams place fifth in their events but all the athletes and coaches became members of the ancient Nova Scotian Order of Waterbuffalo.

The races were held right on the shores of the mighty Atlantic and winded their way through age old ruins and scenic forests. The inordinately hilly course favoured the likes of UBC whose mens' team, composed of three national team members, came in first in the mens' events. Brendan Matthias, that crazy turtle blood drinking speedster from U of T, won the 10km race. On the womens' side Lisa Harvey, another of the ubiquitous Olympians running in the CIAU's, led the Calgary Dinosaurs to a first place finish on the 5km course.

Our women were led by Judy Elfassy in 12th place. This earned her the recognition of Second Team Canadian All Star. Congrats Judy. Snapping at her heels were the swiftly striding sisters of slow-twitch Suzanne Garrett in 17th and Sophie Konward in 18th. Sharon Shew ran a consistent race to place 32nd and Kerry MacKelvie rounded out the first five in 35th place. Melissa Buchan and Heather King posted admirable races with 41st and 44th respectively. The coaches and spectators were impressed once again with the depth and quality of the Queen's contingent.

In an act of competitive symmetry the men also placed fifth in their event. Captain Todd Jones placed 13th overall with an exciting performance that had everyone guessing. "Sooper" Derek Hackshaw ran valiantly and placed 22nd. Grant "If it ain't Nova Scotian it's crap!" Strachan had another strong race and placed 30th. Al Pribaz with Zen mind turned in a decent performance placing 36th. Paul Green and Mark Arsenault rounded out the Queen's team in 42nd and 48th respectively. Chris Minns had an unfortunate run in with a root that necessitated him visualizing the race from the sidelines.

Thus ends the exciting saga of the Queen's cross-country team. It was a great year that saw the toughest womens' competition in a decade and a lot of Olympians going back to school. Both the mens' and womens' teams have had very successful seasons that started during those long summer days in the Ottawa valley. As well, the coaches not only hosted a meet mid-season but won the OWIAA Coaches of the Year Award. A heartfelt congratulations goes out to coaches, support staff, and athletes alike for a job well done. See ya next year. Hammer the Brouley.

Golden Gaels figure skating heading for top

BY ANDRA GILCHRIST
The Queen's Journal

The Queen's varsity figure skating team showed fine form at their first invitational competition this past weekend hosted by the University of Waterloo. Great performances put forth by all team members earned the Golden Gaels third place overall. Dorothy Lai started things rolling with a first place in the Senior B Singles event, skating a very strong program. Joanna Black and Andra Gilchrist earned first place with artistic style in Senior Similar Pairs.

Lisa Keyworth with poise and polish captured first place in the Senior A Singles event. In Open Solo Dance, Deanne Hirada, with grace and strong edges, earned second place. The team's next invitational is at Guelph in January and then the OWIAA championships will be held at Queen's in February.

The team members feel confident that there is definite room for improvement to an overall better standing.

Special thanks go to coach Connie Dwyer and team manager Carolyn Dennis.

Stumpers and queries

BY FRANK OXON
and JOEL SUTHERLAND
The Queen's Journal

It's Q + A time: Can you stump The Journal's sports gurus?

Why not rugby?
Q: Why isn't rugby a CIAU sport?

A: In a nutshell, Ontario is the only province with a competitive university league. Perhaps it will become one in the future, since rugby is getting more popular, and Canada is a medium-rank world power, beating Wales 26-24 last Wednesday. Queen's, with seven of the last eight OUAA championships, would have had an excellent shot at hypothetical CIAU titles since 1986. One could say the same for rowing.

Q: Has a Queen's football player ever won the CIAU's Outstanding Player award?

A: Running back Larry Mohr, who won in 1985, is the only Golden Gael to capture the Crichton Trophy. Many people think Brad Elberg should have won last year.

Q: Several basketball players have won championships in the NCAA, the NBA, and the Olympics. Has anyone ever won EACH more than once?

A: At this point, no one has achieved this ULTIMATE triple-double. Michael Jordan is closest, having won one NCAA (1982 with North Carolina), three NBA's (1991-93 with Chicago), and two Olympics (1984 and 1992).

Why Bitove?
Q: How did John Bitove's group get Toronto's NBA franchise?

A: Apparently the race for the franchise was between Bitove and Larry Tannenbaum's group to begin with — Magic Johnson's group never stood a chance.

Tannenbaum had to prove to the expansion committee that he was dedicated to the NBA. Tannenbaum felt since he was the original bidder (first non-refundable $100,000 deposit), he had the franchise locked. He also had an agreement with the Toronto Maple Leafs to cooperate on constructing a new building, BUT badn't picked a site for it.

Bitove, however, took over the hosting of the 1994 World Basketball Championships at Sky-Dome, after Yugoslavia cancelled because of its civil war. That impressed the NBA. After Bitove showed the expansion committee he had a site and megabucks, Tannenbaum hastily chose a site, but only AFTER he asked the committee to guarantee he would get the franchise (he didn't want to possibly lose another deposit).

NBA Commissioner David Stern did NOT appreciate what in effect was an ultimatum, so he advised the committee to give Bitove the franchise.

Stump us? NOT!
Q: We know Paul Molitor was 1993 World Series MVP and Pat Borders won in 1992. Was there ever an MVP from a losing team?

A: Yes, in 1960, the Yankees lost to Pittsburgh but Bobby Richardson of NY was named MVP.

Q: Hitting for the cycle is the rarest baseball feat. Has anyone ever done it in both leagues?

A: Only one player — Bob Watson for Houston of the NL and the Yankees of the AL.

Q: Which baseball team has been waiting the longest for a World Series victory?

A: The Chicago Cubs haven't won since 1908.

Q: Has anyone ever hit a grand slam homer in his first major-league-at-bat?

A: Only ONE player — Philadelphia Phillies PITCHER Bill Duggleby in 1898 — has ever done this!

Q: Has anyone ever hit home runs from both sides of the plate in the same inning?

A: In 1993, Cleveland's Carlos Baerga became the only player to ever pull this off.

Q: Has anyone ever hit two grand slams in one inning?

A: A PITCHER, Tony Cloninger, did it in 1966 for Atlanta.

Q: How many times have the Boston Bruins won the Stanley Cup?

A: Five times, in 1929, 1939, 1941, 1970 and 1972. They have made the finals 12 other times, most recently in 1988 against Edmonton.

Q: Who are the oldest and youngest players in the NFL?

A: The oldest is Mark Howe of Detroit (38 years, 5 months), and the youngest is Chris Gratton of Tampa Bay (18 years, 4 months).

Q: What is the PGA Tour record for 72 holes?

A: It's 27 under par 257, shot by Mike Sauchak in the 1955 Texas Open. Tom Kite has the 90-hole record — 35 under par 325 in the 1993 Bob Hope Classic.

Q: Someone wanted to know the Philadelphia Phillies' address for whatever reason.

A: Consolation letters should be sent to: PO Box 7575, Philadelphia, PA, 19101. The VP, Public Relations, is Larry Sherk.

In pursuit of excellence

By DANDY JOKELOS
The Queen's Journal

The OUAA Men's volleyball League is underway, with Queen's right in the battle to take top honours this season. Nine players return from last year's team. David Kantor, the 6'8" Rookie of the Year and OUAA all-star, moves from setter to middle this season. Also returning are fourth-year OUAA all-star power hitter Ron O'Hare, and Mike Spence, OUAA all-star middle blocker and Alfie Pierce award winner. Spence has included the right side to his list of potential positions.

This year's offense will be run by third-year veteran Kevin Chiswell. The rest of the line-up will be rounded out with what seventh year coach Brenda Willis calls "the deepest team ever."

There are five second-year players who are all at level where they can contribute to the team's success, as well as four very highly recruited freshmen who show great promise for the future.

The team is off and running with a 2-0 match record, having defeated Laurentian here and Ryerson on the road in straight sets last week.

The season opened on Halloween as Laurentian came out in haunting fashion, initially jumping to a 13-4 lead in the first set. The Gaels couldn't seem to put two things together until their backs were to the wall. Chipping away a little at a time, the Gaels' solid blocking and quick transition game came together, as they came back to win 16-14. Set two was a close fight, with the lead changing nine times before the Gaels' eventual 15-12 victory. Set three was won 15-9 and the Gaels were ahead from the very first point.

Ron O'Hare led the Gaels with 14 kills, 1 block and 1 ace, followed by David Kantor with 11 kills and 4 blocks.

The team clearly improved as the match progressed. Tentative at the start, their timing and confidence improved each set. By the end the Gaels were in complete control.

On Friday, Nov. 5 the team travelled to Ryerson for their second league match and their first on the road. Queen's overpowered Ryerson with their strength and size. Nineteen stuff blocks and 37 kills were earned on the way to a 15-4, 15-13 and 15-1 victory. Queen's was led by David Kantor with 8 kills and 4 blocks, followed by Mike Cvihun who earned 3 kills and 6 blocks.

Setter Kevin Chiswell chipped in 4 kills and 5 blocks, impressive numbers for a setter.

The Queen's women's team split their season-opening matches last weekend, losing to Ottawa in three straight sets, but rebounding to defeat Carleton in four sets, winning 15-0 in the deciding set.

The Gaels play host to the University of Toronto tonight and tomorrow in critical league matches. The Gaels are hoping for a huge crowd this weekend: at 8 p.m. tonight and 2 p.m. tomorrow in the Ross Gym—admission is free—come out and support the Gaels in their pursuit of another set of league victories.

Grab your epee

By STEVE COBHAM
The Queen's Journal

Last weekend, fencers from Ontario, Quebec and the United States joined the RMC and Queen's varsity fencing teams at the 24th annual Royal Military College Invitational Tournament. The event is the largest team competition in North America with 124 teams participating this year.

The purpose of the tournament is twofold. First, it is an opportunity to assess the strengths of the school competing the OUAA and OWIAA leagues, and to compete for the overall trophy. Queen's has won the trophy twice in the past three years. This year, based on the combined results of the five weapons, will have the university's name inscribed once again on the trophy.

Top honours go to the men's foil team of Scott Wright, Harold and Alan Chung who turned in the finest performance by a Queen's team, placing second. It was a long and tough fight, and total victory was only denied them at the end of the day by a solid University of Ottawa team.

Proving that foil was indeed the most hardworking of the Queen's contingent, the women's foil team of Sue Myong, Sylvia Pascual and Melissa Santorelli placed third overall. Again, it was hard work and perseverance that paid off for the team, finishing in the medal rounds.

The men's epee team of Andreas Wild, Dave Arthurs and Dave Williams also turned in a fine performance over the day, but were prevented from placing in the medals, and had to settle for fourth place.

The women's epee team, who suffered through the loss of Amy Olson to the Science Forum, carried on and were led by Sarah Hinchcliffe to finish fifth overall.

The sabre team put in a less than perfect performance and finished ninth overall. Some more work on intensity and focus is required.

After the competition had finished, all the Queen's teams had finished in the top ten of their respective weapons. The team is looking ahead to the competition at Brock University this weekend. Congratulations to everyone who competed for Queen's this past weekend, whether on an "A", "B" or "C" team.

58 Gaels Academic All-Canadians

By FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

In 1992-93, 58 Golden Gaels played CIAU sports and achieved first-class scholastic standing. That combination earned them CIAU Academic All-Canadian honours.

Queen's Athletic Director Rolf Lund said, "It is difficult to balance the extraordinary demands of extracurricular activities. These people are special in that they are great athletes and students."

Here, alphabetically, are those 58 special people:

Daniel Ballin (cross country), Krista Barfoot (field hockey), Paul Bersford (football), Lisa Breton (swimming), Leslie Bruce (track), Gregory Bryk (football), Jason Capello (football), Wendy Carmichael (volleyball), Suzanne Clapp (swimming), Eleanor Colledge (cross country), Scott Cooper (cross country), Paul Cousineau (swimming), Joel Dagnone (football), Eric Dell (football), Lynette Demicell (volleyball), Kathryn Dool (track), Scott

Duggan (cross country + track), Sarah Ferguson (cross country).

Marie Roberts (volleyball), Mark Robinson (football), Brian Saunders (hockey), Eric Scofield (volleyball), Jennifer Sivilotti (soccer), Jonathan Soler (soccer), Jonathan Taylor (football), Sandra Thompson (swimming), Steven Vujacic (hockey), Kyle Wanzel (football), Kelly-Ann Wilhelm (soccer), Jonathan Woodson (cross country), Jeffrey Yach (football), Christopher Young (volleyball), Richard Zugic (track), Leslie Zypchen (soccer).

Congratulations! According to Sports Information Director Cheryl Gross, the OUAA and OWIAA are working to create a similar award to honour those first-class students who play Ontario conference sports.

Among the Academic All-Canadians, football Gaels were members of CIAU championship team. Two of those - Eric Dell and Joel Dagnone - also made the All-Canadian football team. Soccer's Vicki Lowes was also selected to the All-Canadian soccer team.

Finally, The Journal toasts two of its own. Jennifer Flynn (track), is a CIAU Academic All-Canadian athlete. Sports contributor Jillian Boyd (field hockey) is both a CIAU Academic All-Canadian athlete and an All-Canadian field hockey player. Amazing or what!

Women sweep, men lose two

By FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

The Queen's women's basketball Gaels scored two solid wins at home in Bartlett Gym last weekend. But the men's team lost both games, to Brock and Manitoba, at the Brock Invitational in St. Catharines.

Gaels 92, Bishop's 27
This Friday night game saw Queen's utterly dominate the hapless Lady Gaiters.

Queen's applied relentless pressure and consistently frustrated virtually every Bishop's attempt. They forced turnovers, blocked loose shots and passes, and grabbed loose balls, creating a huge number of excellent scoring opportunities. The Gaels shot 60 per cent from the floor, compared to an appalling 17 per cent by Bishop's.

The young Lady Gaiters didn't value the basketball, turning it over 27 times. Bishop's was a national power in the mid-1980's with back-to-back CIAU titles, but they've hit rock bottom now.

Gael Cathy Amara really had her game in high gear, coming off the bench to score 21 points on 10-for-15 shooting. Amara, who played three years for York before sitting out last season, is now attending grad school at Queen's. It has taken time for her to adjust to head coach Dave Wilson's system and overcome the layoff. But on one play in particular Amara showed she's back. She stole the ball at halfcourt, sprinted to the corner, beat a Bishop's defender with a behind-the-back dribble, and finished with a left-handed driving layup along the baseline! A complete player, Amara is channelling her impressive skills into a solid team focus. Although she is not starting, opponents must respect her ability to disrupt a game from the two and three spots.

Many other Gaels also had strong games. Jenny Laughton hit 16 points, Tanya McIntyre scored 13 and shone on D, Vicki Wilson added 10 in limited time, and rookie Anne Marie Baribeau contributed eight points.

Gaels 60, Windsor 54
This Sunday game was hard-fought. Queen's did not play well but still managed to grind out the win in a very physical encounter.

The outcome was very much in doubt with 90 seconds left - the Gaels led 54-51, and Windsor was in a bonus free throw situation. But Vicki Wilson drained a crucial 15-foot jumper from the left bank to put Queen's up by five. A three-pointer by Windsor was answered decisively. Jenny Laughton hit a driving layup, was fouled hard out of bounds after the shot, then sank both free throws to seal the win.

Windsor is a well-coached team with good size; they played solid defense in this game. The Lancers' matchup zone sealed off the paint, and 6'4 post Lesley Daniels stationed herself in the low post, blocking Gaels' attempts to infiltrate the baseline for layups. Queen's did not help their own cause in the first half by repeatedly choosing poor shots, and by failing to convert many of their golden chances. The Gaels still led 31-28 at halftime.

After the break, the game stayed close. Queen's turned the ball over often with poor passes and sloppy ball-handling. The Gaels got into foul trouble - Trina Rasmussen fouled out and the Lancers hit ten straight free throws to stay close. But small forward Laughton had the hot outside shooting hand, and this eventually opened up the paint for post Vicki Wilson.

Laughton scored with a game-high 20 points, and Wilson finished with 18. Dana McCullough hit 18 points to lead Windsor, who were hurt by dismal shooting from Michelle Scott (1 for 9) and Nancy Gyreski (1 for 10).

Athletes of the Week

Instead of honouring one or two athletes this week, we have decided to recognize the teams that competed this past weekend. Firstly, the men's soccer team won our fourth ever OUAA championship since 1904! On Sunday, our men beat the University of Western Ontario 5-4 in penalty kicks. This weekend the team is at Acadia of the CIAU championships.

Both men's rugby teams had a successful weekend. The "Firsts" defeated Western 18-15, for our seventh OUAA championship in eight years.

Winning their fifth consecutive championship, the "seconds" defeated Carleton 28-0.

At Dalhousie University this weekend, our men's and women's cross-country teams both placed fifth overall at the CIAU championships. Judy Elfassy was appointed second team All-Canadian. Both teams had excellent races.

Gaels. Derek Morin, among others, made it clear these were not appreciated.

The last three minutes of the second period was the turning point for the Gaels, who surrendered a goal and two last minute penalties. With a two-man advantage at the beginning of the third period, the Yeomen scored to tie the game at 3, then on the same power play scored with the one-man advantage to go ahead 4-3.

The Yeomen continued their chippy, annoying play and paid for it with three successive penalties. The Gaels capitalized with a Mike Lobinovich goal on a rebound with the Gaels enjoying a 5-on-3 advantage. Queen's had a great chance to go ahead midway through the final frame when Ryan Kantautas beautifully set up feisty Budgell who was robbed right in front.

York scored the winner with just under two minutes left on a shot from inside the blue line down the left wing. York added an empty-net goal to seal the victory.

Block 7, Gaels 2
The Sunday afternoon outing against the Brock Badgers did not start well for the Gaels. Queen's trailed 1-0 just over a minute into the game. They managed to rebound and play effectively against the Badgers; however, a lacklustre power play saw the Gaels fail to convert on their first three advantages with the extra man.

Their fourth power play opportunity came with less than two minutes left in the first period. They blew the advantage with a minute left in the penalty when Lobinovich got a penalty. But, on the ensuing 4-on-4, the Gaels applied pressure deep in the Brock zone, resulting in a Kenneth Ronson goal as he moved in from the point with three seconds left in the 4-4.

The second period started off slow, but Queen's quickly came alive, alas, it was not to be. In a space of 1:13, Brock scored two even strength goals and a power play marker to go up 4-1. None of this was the fault of starting goaltender Bill Landry, who was helpless as the Gaels' defensive game collapsed in front of him. Except for this costly lapse, the Gaels played a strong second period. The lines of Budgell/Girardi/Clark and Gosselin/Bucher/Lobinovich kept the Badgers on their toes. At 14:07 of the period, Ronson spotted Gosselin breaking up the middle and gave him the lead pass. Gosselin then moved it over to Lobinovich who moved in alone and scored.

Despite coming out fast in the third, the Gaels gave up a goal 1:13 into the final frame. A failure to clear the puck allowed a Badger to steal the puck and walk in alone, putting it upstairs. The power play continued its dismal performance when it gave up a short-handed goal five minutes into the third.

At 12:21 the Gaels got caught at the Brock blue line and once again the Badgers scored on a breakaway. That was pretty much all the excitement for the game until Derek Morin crashed into the Brock goal. A minor skirmish followed, nothing of Don Cherry proportions though. Morin was ejected and the Gaels lost 7-2.

There were definite signs of life this weekend in Jock Harty Arena. The next step is converting solid play into victory. Saturday, Nov 20 will be the next chance to see the Gaels in action when they take on our neighbours, the gentlemen from RMC, at 7:30 p.m. See you there.

Holding the mirror up to nature

Hamlet
Written by William Shakespeare
Directed by Fred Euringer
Queen's Drama
BY RYAN P. CHEN
The Queen's Journal

"O, horrible, O, horrible, most horrible!" The Ghost of King Hamlet utter these anguishing words to describe the damning circumstances of his death. After experiencing the Queen's Drama's production of Hamlet on Wednesday night, it now seems to me that this terrifying description applies not to the nature of death, but rather to the nature of life.

Director Fred Euringer aptly characterizes his production as "unconventional." Such a description may be deemed arrogantly self-congratulatory, but if so, Euringer has every right. To put it simply, his staging is ingeniously refreshing. To be attentive for three and quarter hours, to watch the slow development of a what can be a dreadfully static plot (which is not really surprising since the protagonist does like to procrastinate) is no small feat. But through his "unconventional" techniques, Euringer continually invigorates the performance, and thus makes the viewing of Hamlet an effortless and thoroughly enjoyable experience.

Euringer's production begins with a powerful dramatization of Hamlet's distraught mind. Slithering around our hero, the dark figures of the remaining cast members torment the prince with some of his more famous lines, such as "To be, or not to be, that is the question," "O that this too too sullied flesh would melt," and "To post / With such dexterity to incestuous sheets." At the risk of being politically incorrect, Euringer brings Hamlet's sexual problems to the fore by having the scene climax in the blatantly mi-

Frailty, thy name is Hamlet!

Jason Currier

serogynistic line, "Frailty, thy name is woman!"

Of course, the idea that Hamlet is sexually disturbed isn't really novel. But, Euringer puts this own unique twist to the play by having Hamlet recite his "To be, or not to be" soliloquy immediately after our opening encounter with Barnardo, Francisco and Horatio. The position of this soliloquy seems curiously premature (its original place is in Act III), and this rearrangement allows us to view Hamlet from a completely different perspective. From the outset, our beloved Dane is already toying with suicide. His desire for death is now no longer connected with inability to avenge his father's murder, but now arises out of the horrific nature of everyday life. The early placing of the "To be, or not to be" speech also emphasizes the play's post-modernist problem of identity, its preoccupation with being and not being. Dressed in nondescript black turtlenecks and tights, the members of the cast have no identity of their own. They "become" their characters by donning various pieces of clothing, thus taking Polonius's idea that "the apparel oft proclaims the man" to the extreme. But this exaggeration is well noted, for it brilliantly expresses the belief that selfhood can only be defined in relation to the exterior, to the other.

Altering his mood to suit the characters with whom he interacts, Greg Bryk's rendition of our melancholic hero effectively portrays the idea of the mutable self. Granted, Bryk is no Branagh or Olivier, he should nonetheless be applauded for his performance in what is a notoriously difficult role. That Bryk is able to display all of Hamlet's disparate emotions - and often all simultaneously - is a credit to his ability.

All the cast members have their epiphanic moments in the play, and while at times the acting may degenerate to mediocrity, the instances of brilliance, surely, more than compensate. Notable performances include Jennifer Radford's bonnet-waving Osrice, Aaron Martin's joke-cracking Sexton, and Cameron Dixon's pompous Polonius. The play's tour de force, however, is undoubtedly Arwen Downey's handling of Ophelia. Her pathos-instilling portrayal of Ophelia's descent into madness is alone more than enough to carry the play.

Hamlet is a joy to watch. But paradoxically, it is also deeply disturbing. With its characters driven by ambition, lust, and revenge, with its images of disease, violence and sex, Hamlet's world picture seems not so different from our own, and we must conclude that, in terms of human behaviour, little has changed in the course of four centuries. As we watch murder after murder occur, we are inevitably forced to realize that the murderous cycle will continue in perpetuity. Indeed, that Bryk's dead Hamlet, with a mere switch of a garment, emerges as the ambitious Fortinbras only confirms our pessimism.

The only problem (for want of a better word) with Hamlet is that it provides no catharsis. Perhaps this is an indication that, in the contemporary world, our pity and fear can never be purged.

Hamlet runs until Nov.20 and is a must see. General and student/senior tickets are $8 and $6 respectively and are available at Theological Hall.

Viva Crash Vegas

Crash Vegas/The Inbreds
A.J.'s Hangar
BY DAVE CARPENTER
The Queen's Journal

Dozens patiently lined up outside of A.J.'s last Friday night with contained anticipation of the return performance of Crash Vegas. With the addition of special guests The Inbreds, it was by all accounts an entertaining evening of the highest order.

Surprisingly, given the lack of respect ordinarily accorded opening acts, A.J.'s was almost at full capacity as the Inbreds took the stage. With only two members, one could easily have mistaken them for roadies as they plugged in various cords and fiddled with amplifier dials. Yet, despite looking more like a stripped down Volvo than a musical group (what do I mean?), the Inbreds quickly proved that, (a) looks can be deceiving, and (b) quality is often more important than quantity.

As the Inbreds' tight set launched into such highlights as "T.S. Eliot" and "Late Movie," the activity of many on the dance floor evolved from lethargic foot-shuffling and ubiquitous head bobbing to actual dancing. The set wound down with two better-known tunes, "Russ" and "Prince," a nostalgic tribute to a toy dog who, not unlike Old Yeller, is shot in the hindquarters. All of the band's numbers revealed singer/bassist Mike O'Neill's talents, with awesome bass lines that shifted to unorthodox chord improvisations in the choruses. Kudos as well to drummer Dave Ulrich's instinctive style. Crash Vegas came on to a very receptive Throbbing veins and tendons, oh boy! But where's Michelle?

Michael Wiercinski

crowd around 11:30 p.m. and played an hour-and-a-half long set mainly comprised of charged up versions of songs off their most recent album, Stone.

Crash Vegas is like many other Canadian bands, in that while they produce quality music in the studio, it is their live performances that truly shows what they are made of. Friday night was no exception.

The band's departure from some of the softer material of their first album, Red Earth, in exchange for a harder sound, became apparent in their choice of "1800 Days" as the opening song. Coming from the Stone album, this lively number sent beer into the air and dozens to the dance floor, moving to the thick psychedelic bass-lines of Darron Watson and the fine exchange of harmonies between lead vocalist Michelle McAdorey and guitarist Colin Cripps.

Other highlights from the first part of the set included "Nothing Ever Happened" and "Gold and Silver" with McAdorey playing up one aspect of her persona, a deep, bluesy voice and a stage presence that, quite simply, reeked of sex. From here, Crash Vegas lightened things up a bit with favourites from the first album, including "Sky" and the top-forty crowd pleaser "Inside Out." Accompanied by Cripps' steady leads, McAdorey took centre stage again with some of the purest testimonies to her vocal abilities.

As the set progressed, Crash Vegas turned up the volume and pushed down the distortion pedal with a raunched-up version of "One-way Conversation," featuring primordial drum beats laid down by Darren Watson, and an electrifying post-punk rendition of "You and Me." Again, the band's electricity culminated in Michelle McAdorey's stage presence. How so much energy is brought forth from such a small entity is beyond me. One moment she would be thrashing about the stage, screaming into the mike like a Woman Possessed; the next, she would channel all her energy into an amazingly infectious voice while toying with testosterone-soaked young men in the front row. Suffice to say, McAdorey stole the show.

Crash Vegas ended their set with the song "Stone," the best song of the evening. It crossed the gamut of the band's varied style, starting with a slow, almost lurking energy that, once it unleashed itself, kept building right to the end, as McAdorey screamed, "I won't give myself to the one who demands it."

After a brief exit, they came back on to perform a three-song encore made up of an unnamed new song in the same vein as some of their more recent hard-edged material, "Pumpin'," featuring special guest Tim Gibbons, and a charged-up version of Velvet Underground's "I Can't Stand It Anymore."

Like the Inbreds, Crash Vegas is a band that you won't want to overlook.

Welcome to Tim's nightmare

Tim Burton's Nightmare Before Christmas
Directed by Henry Selick
Capitol Theatre
BY TARA LYNN KEATS
The Queen's Journal

The name Tim Burton involuntarily brings to mind (like classical conditioning) surreal creatures with limbs resembling household appliances, realms where the sun never shines, and tales of dark, imperfect heroes who draw upon their painful pasts to set straight a society gone morally astray. Burton's is a unique vision, a personal affinity for the morbid and macabre which is unapologetically celebrated in his previous films such as Batman and Edward Scissorhands, and which is spectacularly showcased in his Nightmare Before Christmas.

his boredom when he resolves to replace "Sandy Claws" and take over Christmas, putting his fellow Hallowentown friends to work on the new task of making Christmas.

While Nightmare is unmistakably Tim Burton's brainchild, it is also visibly a turned version of his imagination. It doesn't contain the sexual electricity or gratuitous violence of some of his previous films, but rather is a sanitized Tim Burton wrapped up in the package of a stop-motion animated musical, suitable for the pre-pubescent audience of the infamous half-hour holiday TV special.

Yet even a five-year-old with the shortest attention span would recognize the "hijacking-of-Christmas" plot as faintly similar to The Grinch Who Stole Christmas. For the most part, the visually captivating details of

Just the average boy next door in Hallowentown.

This most recent installation into the Burton canon opens in Hallowentown, a delightfully bizarre and horrific dimension in which the preparation of Halloween for the "real world" is the primary occupation of the town's strange inhabitants. The population of Hallowentown consists of corpses, vampires, werewolves and other off-beat "Burtonesque" characters for whom a literary description would do no justice. Walking bathtubs and juicy insects cohabit amicably with ghost pets and zombie children. The mayor of Hallowentown is a particularly intriguing character, a rotund corpse of a politician who is literally two-faced, for he has two visages which he can alternate, displaying one face to express smug satisfaction or another to display distress. The town also comes complete with its own resident evil scientist, whose creation is Sally, a lovelorn rag doll with the uncanny ability to untear and remove her limbs when necessary. These gruesome characters are social misfits, comparable to other Burton characters (such as his takes on the Penguin or the Joker in the Batman films), who, despite their morbid tendencies, are not monsters to be hated or feared, for they possess charm and heart.

Leading the ghoulish denizens of Hallowentown is Jack Skellington, a tall and lanky skeleton who is the "Pumpkin King," reigning master of Hallowentown. He is the resourceful engineer behind every successful Halloween prank, yet for all kudos, he is tired of the sameness of his life and yearns for something new. Jack finds just the cure for Nightmare's fantasy charm the viewer away from seeing through the thin story line, but once you've seen one ghoulie with his head torn off, you've seen them all. While one may be slightly peeved at paying eight bucks for a movie that is barely over an hour in length, Nightmare's brevity is probably a good thing, because neither children nor adults could sit attentively through much more of the animated drama, despite the technical mastery portrayed in Burton's film.

For Nightmare, Burton once again enlists the unique sound of Danny Elfman, who not only wrote the score and lyrics for the movie, but provides Jack's singing voice as well. The soundtrack bears Elfman's distinctive mark, with its haunting, dissonant melodies and quirky lyrics. The opening song, "This is Halloween," is at times reminiscent of "Dead Man's Party," a song by Elfman's old rock band Oingo Boingo. Elfman's hallmark style may prove to be his demise in Nightmare, however, as the songs and lyrics become repetitive around the same time that the initial charm of the animation wears thin.

I strongly urge any fan of either Tim Burton's or Danny Elfman's work to go see this film, as both artists are at their idiosyncratic peaks. Tim Burton's Nightmare Before Christmas is also worth seeing simply for its visual brilliance — one can't help but admire the amount of effort, love, and time expended to realize this fantasy. It is quite an achievement.

A sort of homecoming

Olivier Olivier
Directed by Agnieszka Holland
Princess Court
BY CHRISTOPHER ZABEL
The Queen's Journal

Whenever your average mainstream North American director wants to create that effect that people with little critical vocabulary describe as "disturbing," the result all too often has mostly to do with guns that magically never run out of bullets, and violence against women. However, when the European half of the West wants to switch on the blender in our collective stomachs, domestic insanity is often the medium of choice.

Traditionally, French siblings have never been shy about sleeping with each other. Emile Zola, Jean Cocteau's French novels have always been a Freudian disaster area. For those too far emotionally deprogrammed to be upset by mass killing, the European option is a happy solution to a lack of the ultra-weird in one's movie-night (although, come to think of it, those repressed Brits can occasionally cook it up, too, as anyone who saw Close My Eyes a couple of years back can attest).

Olivier Olivier is the story of a little victim of mother domination who one day dons his red hat/hood, rides off to grandma's house, and doesn't come back. Next, someone bearing suspicious similarities to our original neurotic in the making (and a red hat) turns up in Paris (as a street hustler no less), and the question on everybody's minds is already answered, or else we wouldn't have a movie. Domestic fear and loathing too complex to explain then carries through to a conclusion too ambiguous to be comfortable, all of this curiously juxtaposed with the idyllic serenity of the French countryside. And based on a true story.

The basic premise is a further re-telling of the French legend which was filmed in 1982 as The Return of Martin Guerre. Starring Gerard Depardieu, it depicted a sixteenth-century village in which a young man abruptly disappears, leaving his wife and farm. Nine years later he returns from the war (which one I can't recall), a changed man. His story is convincing, his wife accepts him, but, while his farm prospers, so too, do doubts about his identity grow. This story — which the French hold rather dear (but then again they adore Jerry Lewis too) — was, of course, retold in last year's mediocre Richard Gere/Jodie Foster vehicle, Somerset.

With this film, director Agnieszka Holland continues her trend of double names (her last effort was the acclaimed Europa, Europa) and real-life inspiration. This film smacks of mythology and undermines itself by incorporating the supernatural (those confused by W.P. Kinsella should be very afraid). And symbolism, let me tell you: after Olivier disappears, his sister feels that an appropriate response is to be found in lighting a large number of candles, smashing an artistically-arranged pyramid of eggs with a baseball bat, and then lighting a cigarette and stubbing it out in her left breast (David Cronenberg's Videodrome eat your heart out). Beyond sensory overload there is a pleid sort of calmness to be had in at least realizing that you don't know what's going on. (Here's one suburban lobotomized TV junkie who is more than slightly embarrassed at being in awe of anything without a laugh-track.) This might be the story of the prodigal son. However, Olivier never had an inheritance to waste and such a reading doesn't explain the leering grin that he acquired during his absence. Or, it could be that the archetype is upside down here and that it's the parent who learns the moral tag. Still, does Olivier's sister have telekinetic powers? Some strange movies are only alienating and irritating, but Holland's movie has enough plain points of accessibility mixed in to inspire numerous frustrated efforts at planning an interpretation that will allow for all of its elements.

If you have a really good-looking sister or an obsessive mother then Olivier is a guy that you can identify with.

Olivier Olivier proves there are better ways to explain the relationships between adolescents and their parents than the John Hughes system of non-communication and silent psychological brutality.

introduced by Dave Stewart (ex of The Eurythmics, then with two other friends, started a band named State of Play. State of Play was creative (but a financial disaster), and eventually Halliday and Garcia broke it up. At first Halliday sent Garcia hate mail, but eventually realized that she was losing her best friend. She sent Garcia a tape of her latest material, who called her back, thus forming Curve.

Their first recording, the Blindfold EP, was written and recorded in less than a day and was released

Art for art's sake

The Painter's Art, Masterworks of Modernism
Agnès Etherington Art Centre
BY MIKE MOSS
The Queen's Journal

I don't know quite how to explain this, but I'll try. While I'm squinting at The Painter's Art, Masterworks of Modernism in the Agnes, in comes Frank Nulf, a Canadian artist of immense talent whose recent works are on display in the adjacent gallery room. We talk, he turns away devouring every picture at once (or so it seems) but one collage by Robert Motherwell really grabs him. This I notice, only the thought is broken by a solitary little boy who suddenly enters the room and flops himself down dead center in the axis of a Frankenthaler and a Hockney.

That's it, that's all you say? But I tell you, there must be a symbolic value squeezed in between those seconds. Or have I blasphemed by daring to scratch out symbols in this church of Modernism where colour for the sake of itself is the meaning clearly written on the walls?

Alone again, I approach Motherwell's Whamam Board Collage hoping to catch the after tremors jolted by a great artist like Nulf. Although most of the picture field is parcel paper, Whamam is the darkest work amongst selections of such pillars of Modernism as Kenneth Noland and Helen Frankenthaler and Motherwell himself. Motherwell said "abstract art is a form of mysticism." No doubt about that, I oscillate between the Rothko detractors and defenders in Ottawa because when I think about abstract art what wriggles in my brain is the question of sincerity (not money as is the case).

Are they all laughing in their lofts, collapsed with laughter over their easels, or nowadays on the floor next to their canvases? The big book of modern art (trust me, it's big) tells me they (bohemian artists) are sincere and passionate to the point of being romantic.

Motherwell's Californianess covers his art like a light salad dressing. In Zen, the pseudo-hebraic black curve seems as if it's shaking the bleached orange background with which nonetheless it is inseparably bound. But I am forced to leash my emotional purring, for how do I know if Zen is not simply (not so simply) a successful blending of colour and modern flatness? Theory, it seems to me, can be an obstacle in two manifestations: a thick wall and a phantom-like veil.

Curve
Cuckoo
Anxious Records/Virgin Music
Canada
BY CATHERINE LIPA
The Queen's Journal

Curve was once described in Time Out as what would happen "if Lush and the Cocteau Twins had impacted in a terrible industrial accident on a teenage girl's bedroom floor." Two years later, this statement still rings true.

The roots of Curve's angst can, in part, be linked to the bizarre beginning of Toni Halliday and Dean Garcia's friendship. The two were introduced by Dave Stewart (ex of The Eurythmics, then with two other friends, started a band named State of Play. State of Play was creative (but a financial disaster), and eventually Halliday and Garcia broke it up. At first Halliday sent Garcia hate mail, but eventually realized that she was losing her best friend. She sent Garcia a tape of her latest material, who called her back, thus forming Curve.

Their first recording, the Blindfold EP, was written and recorded in less than a day and was released

Maybe one can gauge the meaning of a painting with its title? Noland's Dark Sweet Cherry resists such an attempt even though its smart elliptical concentrics make me wonder about the centre of things. Noland, like Stella, concentrates on flat planes and pure colour, whereas Frankenthaler in Chalk Separates goes even flatter with the technique of paint seepage so that the paint does not produce a layer but a bonding effect with the canvas.

From painting to painting, I struggled with the unknown of abstract art and came to the conclusion that with the transplantation of the artistic heart from Paris to New York it became much easier to praise, to agree with modern art. And I think another phenomenon that art lovers have to deal with is that the modern artist doesn't give a damn about the general viewing public.

If for no other reason, the fame of these four artists is reason enough to see this well-planned exhibit. Its gimmick, explained in more detail in the succinct exhibit booklet, is the relationship between the artists and their musical preferences, a recital of which will be performed by the American quintet, An die Musik at Queen's on March 25, 1994.

Now for the allegory behind the moment: Genius vexed with itself is like a child in a museum — he doesn't know where to play.

Simmering pop

in March 1991. Curve's only wish at that time was to create an interest in the band, but before they knew it, Melody Maker named Blindfold the Single of the Week. Similar praise came from across the British press.

Unlike most of their colleagues, Curve not only put out two more EPs — Frozen and Cherry — within seven months of Blindfold, but they also managed to stay in the British press's good graces. A year later, in 1992, Curve's first full length album, Doppelganger, was released worldwide. Two of the singles from this haunting album, "Fait Accompli" and "Horrorhead," achieved a degree of modern rock success in North America.

Cuckoo, like most sophomore albums, struggles to achieve the success of Doppelganger while not straying far from the Curve formula. The most shocking new sound for Curve is the acoustic guitar on "Left of Mother." Otherwise, what is sadly missing is the vengeance, anger and raw energy of Halliday's voice in the majority of the songs. Instead, the focus is on Halliday's softer, dreamier tone.

The closest Curve come on this album to another "Fait Accompli" or "Horrorhead" are on the opening track (and first single), "Missing Link," and "Superblaster," the first video. While "Missing Link" employs a grungier guitar sound than that normally associated with Curve, "Superblaster" remains true to the typical Curve sound. Despite this similarity to previous material, Cuckoo is not a commercially viable LP.

Halliday still writes the lyrics in a stream-of-consciousness style which allows the album as a whole to be, as Melody Maker wrote of Curve in 1991, "so brilliantly abstract it could be about anything."

This is what keeps Curve so interesting, as well as what allows the album as a whole to be cohesive. Perhaps for their third album Curve will be able to more actively explore their creativity without the pressure of making a sophomore album.

These Res Dogs will have you howling

Residence Dogs
The Queen's Players
Clark Hall Pub
BY OWIN LAMBECK
The Queen's Journal

"Basically, I want a situation where anybody in the bar who is drunk isn't going to get lost." These were the final words of advice given by director Paul Trites to his cast, right before the dress rehearsal for Residence Dogs, a musical comedy show by the Queen's Players, which debuted last night at Clark Hall Pub. He didn't have to worry. Keeping in the fine tradition of previous Queen's Players' performances such as Batperson, Beverly Hillbillies 90210 and Nightmare on Earl Street, this show is not an intellectual challenge. It is, however, a fun evening of lively music, held together by comedic sketches parodying all things related to residence life, from dons to Marriott food.

The plot, if you can call it that, involves the lads from Leonard Residence attempting a big culinary heist from Leonard's cafeteria (frankly, I always preferred making a try for the salad bar myself). This is done as a very loose take-off on the film Reservoir Dogs (for those of you who didn't see it, the hyper-violent, hyper-cool updating of film noir nihilism by wunderkind debut director Quentin Tarantino). Led by the diabolical Boris (i.e., pint-sized Rysskie Cold Warrior of Rocky and Bullwinkle fame), the crew of would-be thieves (Mr. Politics, Mr. Engineering, et al., with the matching dark suits to boot) plans to bring Marriott to its knees. Everything is going according to plan until the women, led by the sinister Natasha (i.e., slinky consort of Boris), decide to take matters into their own hands. Throughout the caper, the audience is treated to lots of sex, violence, and disparaging Marriott references.

The story is funny, but it really just serves as a bridge between musical numbers. With seventeen songs to get through, the cast and director have to really keep it moving, and that they do. Standouts include Todd Houston, performing a version of "Somebody to Love" that puts both George Michael and Freddie Mercury to shame, and great renditions of "Hooked on a Feeling" and "Keep Yourself Alive." All of the numbers feature great choreography and a solid five-piece back up band, led by Dave Hanson. Also very impressive is a group performance of "Spirit in the Sky," which highlights the fact that despite being a goofy show, Residence Dogs features highly talented singers.

In between the musical numbers, the humour can be tasteless and even downright raunchy. Marriott food is the favourite target, with one of the grosser moments referring to chicken balls being made from the testicles of KGB cadavers. (I didn't ask about the Salisbury steak.) Also, look for a hilarious bit involving "mastering your own domain." (All Seinfeld fans know what I mean.) The performances of Jamie Lamb as "asshole so bad he kicks his own ass twice a day" and Sarah Charley as "the pill-poppin'" (and Nyquil slapping) Drew Barrymore are especially entertaining.

The mood of the cast and crew of Residence Dogs was casual and relaxed at dress rehearsal. They know they've got a good show, and they are obviously having a lot of fun with it, which only adds to the audience's enjoyment.

Considering the small venue of Clark Hall Pub (it ain't no North York Performing Arts Centre, now is it?) This is quite an elaborate show, with a cast of fourteen, complex sound and lighting systems. This was an ambitious project that turned out really well, and it deserves a big audience. If you ever lived in residence you won't want to miss it!

Tickets for Residence Dogs are on sale at the Queen's Performing Arts Office in the upper level of the J.D.U.C. The show runs tonight and tomorrow night, then again November 19 and 20 at Clark Hall Pub at 7:00 p.m.

49 people for 49 Acres

49 Acres with The Others
The Toucan
BY PHILIP A. MCBRIDE
The Queen's Journal

If someone were to create a tool to measure the musical energy of a live band, Saturday's show at The Toucan would have sent the needle spinning from mellow to energetic, and back again. However, one problem would exist: the uninterested audience probably wouldn't have even read the meter.

The bar was nearly full when The Others opened up the show at 10:30, after forty-five minutes of set-up and sound checks. The band set a mellow tone with their first number, "Dundas Morning," and followed with the similar "Leroy Packs It In." The performance continued with much the same sound until the fifth song, entitled "All She Wants," which highlighted the guitars of Tom Nesbitt and Matt Evans.

Throughout the entire show Andy Stockton's bass guitar seemed to lead the rest of the band, despite his almost non-existent stage presence. Powerful drumming by Patrick Orange formed the backbone of their folk-rock style. Vocals were shared by the guitarists Nesbitt and Evans, but lacked any confidence or power, forcing the band to rely primarily on their instrumental talent. A definite highlight was the instrumental "Southern Muskellunge," the London's group tongue-in-cheek response to reports of their similarity to The Northern Pikes.

Although the vocals weakened the overall sound, the music, reminiscent of The Grapes of Wrath or early Spirit Of The West, was performed admirably. The Others are now headed eastward touring for their own label, Sabertouque Records.

About half-an-hour after the lights heralded the end of The Others, they dimmed once again to introduce 49 Acres. The Toronto band took the stage around midnight, much to the apathy of the thinning crowd. Starting with "The Addiction of Louis Riel," the set included many songs off the band's independent album, Living In The Drywall. The music varied little throughout the show, with the exception of the excellent ballad "The Ghost of Nobody's Business."

Sounding like a cross between The Pogues on valium and a slightly less annoying version of the B-52's, the group's sound was defined by the voice of singer George Donais. The vocals were shared with guitarist Grant Edmond's, whose Lou Reedesque style was the band's under-utilized hidden strength. This duo worked well on the energetic number "Loretta Save." Drummer James Pollock and guitarist Steven Ellis managed to keep up with Edmonds' acoustic assault, but for this song a special round of applause has to go to bassist Mike Biderman, who hopped around the stage despite the cast on his foot.

Halfway through the show the band played their original "Mother Nature's Referendum in the Spirit World," a song which earned 49 Acres a regular spot in the CFNY radio rotation. The band continued their energetic folk, but was unsuccessful in bringing the audience into the performance. Throughout the show the sound seemed hollow, as if some vital part were missing. Edmonds revealed afterwards that their violinist was unfortunately absent, and a quick listen to the 49 Acres album proves the positive impact this one instrument has on their sound.

"Ferris Wheel," an unreleased number, marked the end of the night for 49 Acres. The band is en route to a few U.S. concerts in Detroit and Cleveland, and look forward to working on a second album over the next few months, to be released in the spring. In a discussion with the band after the show, Edmonds noted his surprise at the lack of enthusiasm in The Toucan on Saturday night. Twice during the performance, the band encouraged the audience to get up and dance, and the intense music certainly called for it.

Both times the shrinking crowd simply stared at the stage, and hardly even clapped. When asked how many people went to Queen's one or two hands bothered to make a noise. "Maybe they all have mid-terms tomorrow," Edmonds quipped after the show. The only problem being that tomorrow was Sunday.

Cervisophile by Ash Baker

The Kingston Brewing Company

"This shop is dedicated to those who appreciate the art of drinking, rather than the act of swallowing."
This sign hangs prominently in the public bar of the Kingston Brewing Company, and I don't think truer words were ever spoken. The Brew Pub is the Kingston Mecca of good ale. Nowhere else is fine beer taken so seriously, or enjoyed as thoroughly. The reason for the Kingston Brew Pub's exalted position is this: they brew their own beer, on the premises, and that beer is excellent.

Almost every licensed establishment in this city has at least one beer on tap, but the fact that a beer comes out of a keg is not by any means a guarantee of quality. Molson Canadian is exactly the same product in keg or in bottle — a filtered, pasteurised, carbonated liquid, somewhat lacking in character. Even something like Smithwick's Irish Ale, a good beer by any standards, is, like Canadian, clarified, pasteurised and carbonated. These processes are bad for the beer because they move the beer away from its original form. Carbonation and pasteurisation are often compromises, injustices imposed upon the beer to enable it to be put in bottles and transported around the world to be sold at vast profits. There are some styles of beer that are excellent in bottles, indeed, some cannot be presented any other way, but for Lager, and especially ale, the cask that they were decanted into right after fermentation, is home.

Which brings us back to the Brew Pub, where they make their own beer, in a brew-house in the back, and serve it as it is meant to be served: drawn from casks by traditional hand-drawn beer engines (pumps). The distance from brewery to bar is about four yards. The Brew Pub always has two of its own beers on tap: Regal Lager and Dragon's Breath Real Ale.

Regal Lager is a light-drinking, rich-tasting, somewhat fruity beer, that seems to me more like an English than a German lager (the larger style originated in Germany). Be warned that this is not the lager you are used to. The colour (a rich, dark amber) can be a little off-putting to drinkers who are used to the unpleasant yellow of Blue, but after one taste, there is no going back: most people go off ordinary lager forever. The beer is filtered, but not pasteurised, and the only carbonation is natural, so the beer does not fizz. Regal is served, not iced, but at cellar temperature, so that more of the true flavour of the beer can come out. Because there is no need to worry about the beer warming up too much (it tastes great even approaching room temperature), or going flat (natural carbonation lasts much longer), there is no need to hammer down a pint of Regal in the short time before it becomes undrinkable. A Regal can last a good deal longer than a pint of ordinary beer.

Regal is infinitely better than the average Canadian lager. It actually has a personality and flavour of its own, which many of Molson's and Labatt's products do not. It has a light, endearing fruitiness (hints of sweet apple?), without the overbearing sweetness of Canadian or Black Label. It has "no unpleasant aftertaste," without being as flavourless as Molson Dry. In short, Regal Lager is an excellent beer, far superior to any of the big brewers' products, and definitely worth a try, even if you think you loathe everything but Canadian.

Dragon's Breath Real Ale is what it says it is: a Real Ale, the only one available commercially in Kingston. Real Ale is ale the way it is supposed to be made: unfiltered, unpasteurised, naturally carbonated, and cask-conditioned. To the dedicated ale-drinker, it is absolute heaven. Cask-conditioning is the practise of leaving the beer to undergo secondary fermentation in the cask, often with the addition of extra yeast and/or sugar. The beer, rather than being inert and lifeless, is alive, and evolving. There is living yeast in the beer, the flavour is complex and subtle; the whole effect is rather wonderful.

So it is with Dragon's Breath. The brew is a pale ale, of moderate bitterness, but with a faintly, mildly yeasty character and a wonderfully complex, organic flavour. It seems to me to have got stronger and darker over the years (it is now about 5.5% alcohol), but the flavour remains essentially the same. It is served in the same manner as Regal — hand-pumped, at cellar temperature, naturally carbonated — but it is by no means as accessible. It is not a beer for everyone, but for those who wish to move beyond Smithwick's, Rickard's, and Conner's, this is the ale for you. It will probably be quite unlike anything you have tasted before, but if you get a grip on you, you will love Dragon's Breath as long as you live.

From time to time, the Brew Pub also makes specialty beers. Right now the beer is Pook's Ale, described as a "Hunny Lager." The hunny adds an interesting sweetness to the Regal-based recipe, and is well worth a glass or two. The good thing about the Brew Pub's specialty brews is their variety — you can sample beers that normally would be impossible to find. However, they are never around for long, and it is unwise to dawdle or put off your visit.

The Brew Pub also serves more conventional beers — Hart, Conner's Special Draft, Strongbow Cider, Guinness, and Moosehead — as well as making its own wines (red and white). The specialty at the moment is mead (honey wine).

The Brew Pub is well worth a visit. The beer is unquestionably the best in Kingston, and is a place truly congenial for the cervisophile: "the one who appreciates the art of drinking rather than the act of swallowing."

Statistics time! This article was written at the grade 9 level and has a reading ease index of 62. This is the preferred level of reading difficulty for most readers, requiring 6 to 10 years of education. Ash used an erudite 4.51 letters per word. Keep in mind that a high score from our grammar-checking program doesn't automatically confer the title of Nobelium laureate; Hemingway's novels were written at a grade 4 or 5 level (it was probably all that cheap gin).

Ach Baker watches lots of Star Trek and has yet to explain why Romulan ale is blue.

The next time you're at a party, you can impress people with this fact: the phrase "Jesus loves you", played backwards on a tape, becomes "We smell sausage". How, you ask, do we MISC editors amass such a vast store of universe-shaking knowledge? Simple, we reply. There exists a vast, sometimes loosely-affiliated web of organizations, religions, cabals and the like whose only purpose to expose the hidden knowledge of the ages through the mail. C'mon kids, put on your Devo energy domes, read on and keep repeating the mantra "Everything my prof tells me is a lie...everything my prof tells me is a lie..."

The Journal of the Institute of Scientific Santa Clausism (c/o D. Meyer, Box 70829 New Orleans, Louisiana 70172) is devoted to collecting scientific and historical evidence for the literal existence of Santa Claus. They claim to have discovered an actual Shroud of Santa, but wouldn't give us the details until we sent them money for a subscription. Sure, skeptics like Secular Grinchists and Claustrophobics have all sorts of "scientific explanations" behind the gifts that magically appear Christmas Eve, but such pool-pooing is just part of the Big Conspiracy, nicht wahr?

According to Dogbert, the cunning dog in the comic strip Dilbert, if your friends ask you to babysit their children at the last minute, you have the right to convert them to any religion you want. A good choice of religion is the Church of Beaver Cleaver (122 E. Benson St., Decatur, Georgia 30030), whose adherents believe in the "Eternal Triad" of the Beaver, Wally and Eddie (note the parallel to id, ego and superego - makes you think, no?) and the Supreme Duo of Ward and June (television's first portrayal of the metaphysical dualism of Western thought). You'll have a blast as you command your babysitters to capture and sacrifice those heretics who watch Full House.

Speaking of religion, allow your humble editors to proselytize: the Church of the SubGenius (Box 140306, Dallas, Texas 75214) is the one true religion. We believe that on X-Day, July 5th, 1998 at precisely 7 a.m., the followers of J.R. "Bob" Dobbs will be saved by friendly aliens who will whisk us off this miserable planet in their Pleasure Saucers. Subgeni delight in making pisstakes at the far left, far right and middle-of-the-road who practice thinking only as a hobby. Having published the only books to tell the truth since Judy Blume's Are you there God? It's me, Margaret, the Church of the SubGenius disseminates its wisdom disguised as a pastiche of pop culture, clever "Bob" of the Church of the SubGenius aphorisms and UFO literature.

Pity Madonna. What with lacklustre album sales, harassment from Toronto's Morality Squad, bad hair days and Evian bottles just not being ribbed enough, the last thing Ms. Ciccone needs is to be foisted by an ICBM. The goal of the Association to Save Madonna from Nuclear War (3-228 McCormick St., Cincinnati, Ohio 45219) is to declare a nuclear-free zone with a radius of 200 miles around that overexposed beauty mark. A noble attempt, we're certain, but we're not sure it's possible. After all, Anne Murray can't even get that crazed farmer to obey the restraining order.

Uranus, alas, was one of those words that always caused a commotion in my sixth grade class (along with "organism", which my friend Steve always mistread aloud as "orgasm"). As a tribute to the most unfortunately-named planet in the solar system, the Up Uranus Society (Box 1369, Carmel, Indiana 46032) devotes newsletters, t-shirts, bumper stickers and the like to showcase such gems of thought as "The narrow shaft of knowledge penetrating Uranus should not be broken off." "[Collision with a large asteroid] while not wiping Uranus out, certainly knocked it on a tilt" and "Uranus, not truly a place where the sun never shines, but certainly a place where the sun shines faintly." We'd like to add our own lines to the list: "Uranus: A Gas Giant" and "Is Uranus ripe for colonization?" Arf arf.

One final pearl of wisdom: those of you on the "Dean's Other List" may not be earning your degree at this fine institution. However, all is not lost. Simply send away to Bo Diddly Tech/Darwin University (Box 2326, Evanston, Wyoming 82930), a school affiliated with the Church of Universal Confusion, for your information packet. With hours of studying and a handsome cheque for $15US, you can save face and proudly present your Doctor of Technology degree to your parents. Surface still alive, just ASUS Assembly to consider opt-outable funding

BY KAREN HALL
The Queen's Journal

Surface remains barely alive. As of an Arts and Science Assembly meeting last night, the ASUS executive is looking into making Surface funding opt-outable, subject to approval by referendum in February.

ASUS President Jenn Steeves withdrew a motion to remove the Surface constitution from the ASUS constitution, and said Assembly will instead be presented with a motion on the possibility of opt-outs for Surface funding at next Thursday's meeting.

"The students have spoken and the ASUS Assembly must respect that," said Drake Carlyle, ASUS communications commissioner. "A referendum in February with regard to opt-outable fees [is possible, but] until then the Assembly must follow the wishes of students," Carlyle said.

But according to the No to Surface campaign leader Andrew Dick, "this was a calculated ploy to get Surface funded and keep it functioning under ASUS... It is an absolute embarrassment."

Whether or not Surface will be able to publish again this year remains up in the air.

Editor Junipero Lagtapon said he has an "intent to work toward a private paper with the title of Surface."

sides [of the debate] will benefit from this compromise," he said.

Perry urged Assembly members to "approach [the question] with open minds and open eyes" and called opt-outs a "viable alternative."

Lagtapon said that eliminating Surface would "eliminate the intellectual and critical debates of this university... Surface represents minority views on campus."

Cancelling Surface will tell minorities at Queen's "we don't want diversity, we don't want your voices to be heard," Lagtapon said. "To eliminate discourse is to eliminate change" at Queen's, he continued.

However, "this is not a compromise," argued Heath Grant, ASUS vice-president. "It would give the funding that students voted against."

In response to concerns that Assembly was afraid of looking bad, Grant replied that "the issue is one of accountability, not one of looking bad."

ASUS Senator Anastasia Conlan argued that Assembly must represent the electorate. "We are here as elected representatives, not as bigots, racists, or homophobes," she said.

Conlan said that calling people opposed to funding Surface intolerant is "emotional blackmail."

OUSA sets agenda Student group criticizes COU proposal

BY JEFF GRAY
The Queen's Journal

The Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance has released a document slamming the Council of Ontario Universities' proposal to hike tuition fees by 50 per cent.

In addition, the OUSA document criticizes the COU's call for huge reforms to student aid, and reaffirms OUSA's commitment to matching government funding increases for tuition fee hikes.

Alma Mater Society President Katherine Phillips said the document, entitled In the Public Interest, "reflects the changes in terms of the government's financial situation" but maintains "our direction... it was written in the spirit of Students for Change [the first OUSA document, released in November of 1992]."

Phillips said she also hopes the document will set the record straight about OUSA, an organization which the COU views as ready to accept tuition increases.

"We don't agree with the COU," she said. "We are completely against shifting the burden on to students."

Phillips said she hoped to make the document as accessible as possible to anyone on campus interested in knowing more about OUSA and what it stands for.

The document concentrates on linking post-secondary education with economic growth, and on student aid reform. Its recommendations include:

- the elimination of ancillary fees, such as the $10 per half course compulsory student assistance levy at Queen's.
- an increase in operating grants to universities, in proportion to tuition fee increases.
- a greater student say in how new revenue is spent.
- the expansion of the Ontario Special Bursary Program, and the pilot project of the income contingent loan plan.

Artists drawn to women's conference

BY YODIT ROCHE JOHNSON
The Queen's Journal

On Nov. 13, women of colour came to Queen's from as far as Calgary and Newfoundland to share their experiences and their work as artists. They gathered in Dunning auditorium for the conference Voices in Art: Tools of Resistance, organised by Amina Ally and Lianne Yoshida, and co-sponsored by the AMS education commission and the Ontario Public Interest Research Group.

These women spoke about a myriad of issues integral to the development of their art and their artistic consciousness. Culture, language, feminism, funding, racism, storytelling, political correctness, cultural appropriation, colonialism, and healing were among the topics raised by speakers.

As keynote speaker, Sunera Thobani, president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, opened discussion by defining art as a form of communication that comes from a collective experience that cannot be reduced to the individual.

Thobani challenged the stereotype of the artist as an intellectual genius who works and creates in isolation. She noted that art and culture are not just memories, they are expressions of what is alive, they are growing and dynamic.

Winsom, a multi media artist who studied at the Jamaican School of Art, said that when most voices come from one gender, one class, one race, we lose the diversity of our community and of our species. She noted that visual art is a powerful medium and is "the only voice some groups have."

Discussing the significance of spirituality in her work, Winsom stressed that her work "is a celebration and it is very political." She said that she has gone beyond the pain and the hurt and now fulfills her need to express faith, hope, joy and clarity.

Rachel Kalpana used her personal experience as "a brown-skinned girl who had a countenance of shame" to explain that societal "mirrors prescribe ways of being rather than reflect the way we are."

She spoke of the artist's "duty to express all the different parts of themselves" and to "put out our expression so that it becomes a mirror... for other people, so that they will see parts of themselves that are not normally expressed in society."

Many women of colour talked about the major role of theatre as a powerful and healing art form. The Sugar 'n' Spice players performed a humorous and touching excerpt from a production that will open in Toronto a year from now. Through the lives of a lesbian couple and their young teenage daughter, these players spoke to women of colour about parenting, youth, cancer and Caribbean culture.

Their performance reinforced Sheila James' earlier assertion

York president discusses her role

Suggests the personal and the political are intertwined

Watched "like a hawk" as York University president.

BY KRISTEN KUNNAS
The Queen's Journal

Last Thursday evening, as part of the series of lectures entitled "Women As Leaders," York University President Susan Mann spoke before an attentive audience on "The Challenges, Rewards and Costs of Being a President," in Ban Righ's Fireside Room.

Mann is a fellow of the Royal Society of Canada who has written extensively on the social history of Quebec, and for many years has been active in organizations focusing on the life of women in universities.

After an introduction by Queen's Dean of Women Pamela Dicky-Young, Mann began her lecture by discussing a week in the life of a university president.

In one week, Mann said, she attended four convocations, four greetings, one celebration, introduced a VIP to York, lectured at Queen's, and met with the minister of education, to name but a few of her week's responsibilities as president of York.

Mann told the audience that in the position of university president, one can't disentangle the personal from the political.

"The personal will insinuate itself into the political," said Mann of her many duties, "for the political gets informed, enlightened, and bolstered by the personal. You make a strong connection with people if you are aware of your own connections. Linking the two, you bring an intensity to whatever you are doing."

On the challenges of being a university president, Mann reflected, "it is important not to make your job into a male/female [issue]. As president, you have to be an advocate for the entire university, not for a particular part."

She said it is an honour and a privilege to be a university president, and that the rewards are "meeting endlessly fascinating people and always learning something."

"The challenge is not to compromise, the reward is not compromising, and the cost is to compromise," Mann said.

Mann said she views her role as president of York University symbolically, yet, "the symbolism is quite hard to live in. You do not get the chance to interpret because people watch the president like a hawk."

"The least thing [I do or say] is going to be interpreted as 'she favours this' or 'she favours that.' You have to be conscious of the fact that you send out signals."

Mann said she feels a strong enthusiasm for York, and her goals for the university reflect her optimism.

"To my sense ... what York needs at this particular time is a pulling together and a pride in their wonderful accomplishments, an energizing to continue on with things which we're known for."

She concluded her lecture by entreating the audience to live actively.

"Don't be silent," Mann said. "Don't put any restrictions on yourself."

The Applied Science Faculty Board has passed a motion to reconsider its original decision to go ahead with a name change for the faculty and fly in the face of a student plebiscite in which students voted to keep the faculty's name the same. The Faculty Board, on which both students and faculty sit, will consider the name change again on Jan. 11.

What's your sign? The Alma Mater Society Accessibility Task Force is sponsoring American level one sign language classes next term. The classes, which normally cost over $100, will cost only $35, and will run Tuesday evenings from January to April. Registration forms are available in the AMS office, as well as the special needs office, from Nov. 22 to 27.

In the spirit of National Alcohol Awareness Week, we've concocted a brief mix of related fast facts from the Bacchus and Gamma brochure on Alcohol and Women.

- It has been discovered that women have far smaller quantities of the protective enzyme dehydrogenase, which breaks down alcohol in the stomach. As such, a woman will absorb about 30 per cent more alcohol into her blood than a man of the same weight, who has drunk an equal amount, will.

- Alcohol abuse can result in the body's inability to use vitamins and calcium. Continued abuse can result in dull skin and hair, aggravated acne and dandruff.

Rector to follow up on Emerson resignation

BY BRAD ELDER
The Queen's Journal

The events surrounding last week's resignation by Alma Mater Society Board of Directors Chair Catherine Emmerson will be investigated by Rector David Baar.

However, Baar says he has no plans to play Sherlock Holmes.

"Basically, I wouldn't call it an investigation," he said. "I see it more as trying to get closure."

Baar said that he would be speaking with Emmerson, AMS President Katherine Phillips and other Assembly members to flush out a fair account of the situation which backgrounded the resignation.

But don't expect any finger-pointing.

"I suppose if I wanted to sort through everything I could find someone to blame something on," Baar said, but added that he could not be sure that his representation of the facts would be accurate.

Instead, Baar plans on simply presenting the viewpoints of the parties involved to Assembly next Thursday.

Baar explained that Emmerson dismissed herself from last Thursday's AMS corporate meeting before discussion period was held, and, in her absence, "people started speculating" as to why she resigned. He hopes his investigation will clear up the matter.

As reported in last week's Journal, Services Director Stephanie Taylor attributed Emmerson's resignation to personal reasons, at last Thursday's Assembly.

Speaking to The Journal, Emmerson said that she would prefer to wait for next Thursday's presentation by Baar to comment on those speculations.

As for who will be taking over as chair of the Board of Directors, Emmerson said that Grant Hughes, who is currently the vice-chair, has not decided whether or not he will fill the vacancy.

Queen's places second to McGill in Maclean's rankings

BY BRAD ELDER
The Queen's Journal

The third annual Maclean's university rankings issue hit the newsstands last week, and for the second time in three years, Queen's University played second fiddle to McGill in the medical/doctoral group of universities.

This year's report featured the usual university rankings based on criteria such as student body, class size, faculty, finances and reputation.

Additions to the annual feature, called A Measure of Excellence, included a cross-border comparison with select American universities, and a separated-at-birth category, which linked Queen's and Saskatchewan.

Vice-Principal (Resources) Rod Fraser praised the work done by Maclean's.

"Maclean's has really done quite a superb job in raising the profile of the performance of universities ... and raising the profiles of universities themselves," he said.

Asked about Queen's number two position, Fraser said that students should be careful not to pay too much attention to specific rankings.

He noted that while Queen's finished behind McGill in the medical/doctoral category, their positions were reversed in the North American comparison, which pitted such Ivy League names as Harvard and Yale against their Canadian counterparts.

Katherine Phillips, president of the Alma Mater Society, also noted the incongruity.

"The fact that we outdid McGill in the North American comparison ... tells the intelligent reader that different stats can tell you different things," she said.

Fraser and Phillips both expressed confusion with some of the statistics provided by Maclean's.

Phillips said that the poor rankings given to Queen's for its operating budget and alumni support were "bizarre. Queen's has had no deficit and a strong, very stable budget for years, and [has] just received over $100 million from the [Queen's Challenge] campaign," she said.

In addition, Fraser warned against giving too much clout to Queen's poor placement in the "most innovative" category of the reputation survey, as it likely did not take into account future projects such as the Queen's Biosciences Complex.

"This will be a unique facility in Canada," Fraser said of the multi-million dollar project, adding that it will "absolutely put us on the leading edge of Canada."

He commented that while Maclean's has improved its method of data collection, "much more needs to be done, can be done," toward accumulating more reliable data.

However, the survey does fulfil a useful function in "challenging us to think about what really are the objectives in universities for [teaching and research]," he said.

Phillips mentioned that she is "interested to see how the trend will change in the next few years when we get McGill's Vice-Principal (Academic) [William Leggett] as principal."

Overall, Phillips said, the survey "makes me proud to be a student at Queen's."

Notably, Maclean's imposed 50-point penalties (out of a possible 1,000 points) to Memorial and Carleton for their refusal to participate in this year's survey. Both schools' saw their rankings drop by three places, as Carleton dipped to ninth, and Memorial to eleventh, in the Comprehensive university category.

According to the article, Memorial objected to the "fatally flawed" process inherent in the university rankings, and Carleton refused to fill in the Maclean's questionnaire partly because it did not want to spend the resources in a time of cutbacks.

Herstmonceux: Queen's footprint in Europe

BY JEFF GRAY
The Queen's Journal

Maurice Yeats is king of the Queen's castle.

A former head of the Queen's geography department, Yeats is the executive director of the new Queen's International Study Centre at the Herstmonceux Castle in southern England. He addressed an alumni luncheon recently and detailed some of the plans the university has for the castle, which is tentatively slated to take in a first set of undergrads next July.

Wealthy alumnus Alfred Bader donated the 15th-century castle to Queen's earlier this year.

Yeats thinks the castle will help raise Queen's international profile. "It will be a footprint for Queen's in Europe," he said.

"Our reputation is as an outstanding Canadian university, but we're not an international institution... we're not known internationally."

Students stand to benefit from an international education, said Yeats. "You have to know how the global economy works... [the castle] focuses on a dimension which they don't get here."

And the castle is well situated to give students a taste of the European community. Just a train ride from London and a brief ferry to France, Yeats hopes courses at the castle will be scheduled to give students Fridays and weekends to experience Europe hands-on.

It's all part of what Yeats called "market-driven education." He said the demand is clearly there for more hands-on education, and more opportunities to travel, and the castle covers both these needs.

Renovations are currently underway at the castle grounds to prepare for the 200-250 students who will need class space, course facilities, and food and lodging.

The castle, with a bit of work, will prove more than adequate, Yeats said. But the renovations carry a royal price tag, which is only partially covered by the $12 million Bader gift.

It's going to cost $2 million alone to get "one drop of hot water running through the place," Yeats said, and a similar amount to update the castle's kitchens, which are currently an "absolute mess." The castle, once renovated, will serve 750 meals a day to students in a grand medieval dining hall.

And of course, what would a castle for Queen's be without a pub? Herstmonceux has a nice one, said Yeats, complete with wood panelling and a fireplace. And if you're in the mood to dance, the castle also has an ornate ballroom.

Academically, the castle will be set up to provide Queen's undergrads with completely transferable credits.

The programs offered, of course, will have a European angle. The term will have a humanities focus, the winter term a social sciences focus, and the summer is to be for commerce students.

The castle's target group is second- and third-year students. The programs are set up so that students won't fall behind in their compulsory courses.

One term's room, board and tuition at the castle will cost $6,000. Yeats said the average expenditure per term of a Queen's student in Kingston is $5,200.

He said the student residence will occupy a complex west of the castle, now called Bader Hall. The building was built by the Royal servatory which formerly occupied the site.

It was designed, Yeats said, to withstand a nuclear blast. "I would make them perfect Queen's student residences," he said.

The castle's inner courtyard has a large ornate clock. Yeats pointed in reference to the long-standing tradition of problems with Grant Hall clock tower, "Queen's now owns another clock that doesn't work."

The castle, once it is up and running, should be financially self-sustaining, Yeats said. "Or, at least more self-sustaining than any other Queen's project."

Students grade high school

BY MICHELLE PELLEGRIN
The Queen's Journal

Did high school prepare you for university?

Queen's students debated this question last Thursday when the Ontario Royal Commission of Learning visited the university to discuss the future of the Ontario education system.

The two-hour forum, open to all Queen's students, was mediated by Greg Frankson, the Kingston agent for the commission.

"It is important that students should have an opportunity to give direct input into the system, so that they don't feel excluded from the process which is set up to educate them," said Frankson.

Representatives of the royal commission are travelling around the province to gather the opinions of parents, teachers, school board officials, and students. The aim is to get a perspective of feelings about the way education is run in Ontario, said Frankson.

The information collected at forums such as this one will be compiled in a report due Dec. 1994. The recommendations will go directly to the provincial government, which will decide the next course of action on how to reform our school system, Frankson explained.

Candice Leddy, internal vice-president of the Concurrent Education Students Association, said the forum is "an excellent chance to discuss expectations and problem areas in our primary and secondary schools."

Leddy said she was "happy to see the interest of the students and their positive suggestions for improvement" of schools in Ontario.

Con-ed student Greg Sumi was one of many students who shared their views on Ontario's education system. "We [Ontario students] have had more preparation than other students from outside the province," he said.

Leddy said "if you don't get good habits down early [before OAC], there is a good chance that people will fall out first year."

Shannon Bolton, criticized "irrational," and also stated that "aren't being challenged enough."

The students had their share of criticism for the school system. Leddy claimed she "never got proper instruction on how to prepare for tests."

Another con-ed student, Snudh, said that she was never pressured to "learn and deal with pressure."

Many students at the forum agreed that school boards must be working together to produce successful results.

OPIRG in El Salvador

Group sends volunteers to monitor election

BY ROSSETTE BYRNE
The Queen's Journal

The Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG) in Kingston seeks to send a team of observers to El Salvador in March 1994 to monitor the country's national elections.

OPIRG's Kingston branch was formed two years ago, joining a Canadian network from British Columbia to Nova Scotia.

Michael Crumney, OPIRG coordinator for Kingston, said the organization has a "broad mandate" on international issues of concern. Crumney outlined the fundamental aim of OPIRG in the immediate future — "basically to raise people's awareness on public issues."

OPIRG Kingston plans to send between four and six representatives to El Salvador, including Queen's students, members of the Kingston community, and volunteers. The OPIRG members will join a team of United Nations observers currently in El Salvador.

The mission addresses the continued existence of corruption and injustice within the country, despite the signing of the peace accord in 1992 to end a 12-year civil war, Crumney said.

He pointed to the continued strength of the military as an obstacle to democracy in El Salvador. Rigged elections in the past and the frequent assassination of candidates threaten positive change, he said.

Crumney explained that the most obvious reason for sending OPIRG observers is to show how an "international presence [in El Salvador] is essential to having a fair election and to stop election-rigging.

"The international community wants it to be a free and fair election," said Crumney.

Another reason for sending a team to El Salvador rises out of concern for the lack of international attention and pressure on this part of the world, as the media focuses on other troubled regions.

Crumney said, "because the peace accord has been signed, people have forgotten about El Salvador, but there are still problems." He referred to 21 separate items of the peace accord yet to be fulfilled by the agreement.

"The only way to get attention in the local press, and general awareness, is to have Kingstonians and Queen's students in El Salvador during the election," he said.

Crumney said he considers the only way to get the government to abide by the peace accord is to increase international pressure.

OPIRG is concerned about the number of political killings which are still a part of everyday life. Crumney said that since the peace accord was signed there have been 55 political assassinations.

The United Nations presence in El Salvador seeks "to get rid of impunity" (the lack of enforced punishment) of assassins of political candidates, he said.

The El Salvador mission is a "joint venture" between OPIRG and a number of local groups including AMSCODI (the Alma Mater Society Committee on Development Issues), and the Central American Solidarity Committee.

AMS tackles student hunger

BY TARA ROY
The Queen's Journal

"Hungry students ... at Queen's?" asks a pamphlet put out by the Alma Mater Society's Hidden Hunger Committee.

The newly formed committee works "not just to raise funds but also awareness," said Mike Hammer, chairperson of the committee. "Hunger is something that's overshadowed in the whole world," he stated.

For students, hunger is an "inner conflict, with the student trying to grasp new material, and food material. People have a right to eat, and sometimes that gets distorted," said Hammer.

According to Hammer, the Kingston Partners in Mission Food Bank, with which the committee has been associated in all its activities, helps approximately 20 to 30 Queen's students every month.

But this number may be inaccurate. The Partners in Mission does not keep figures directly related to Queen's, and many students are held back because of social pressure and pride, said Matthew Blake, who is in charge of public relations for the committee.

In addition to personal reasons for not seeking assistance, "what about the people who don't know about the food bank?" asked Blake.

Hammer described the AMS committee as "a low-key group" which "only scratches the surface" of the problem.

"The problem is always there, we're not really a civilized community until everyone eats," he said.

In an effort to reduce hunger, the committee is holding a food drive on Wednesday, Nov. 24 from 5:30 to 8 p.m.

Teams of first-year students, followed by cars with hot chocolate and treats, will travel door-to-door to collect food in the student housing area.

With support from residence dons, the committee is hoping to attract many students to vie for a free Subway dinner, the prize for the team which collects the most food.

The collected food will go to the Partners in Mission Food Bank, where it will be used to help feed the community, including students.

"I assume that 98 per cent of students are well-to-do," said Hammer, and therefore the purpose of the food drive is to "ask richer students to support poorer students."

In order to get help from the Partners in Mission, students need a referral in the form of a letter or a phone call from a number of agencies on campus, such as the Registrar's Office, Student Counselling, the Special Needs Office, Student Health Services, or the Dean of Women.

However, even with such a referral, using the food bank can pose problems for students, because it is far from campus (at 412 Bagot Street) and it may be difficult to be discrete while using the service.

Because of this obstacle, the committee is looking into the feasibility of setting up some kind of food service on campus in the future which might operate by buying food cheaply in bulk, and selling it to students at cost.

The committee is planning a poll for next term in order to "know exactly where the problem is — to sharpen our mandate in terms of student needs," said Hammer.

Other goals for the group include raising hunger awareness at other Canadian universities, and forming a sub-committee to lobby the government "for a program to feed everyone on the streets," said Hammer.

The committee's ultimate goal is not to be needed. "We want to quit this," Blake explained.

Don't just shuffle — shuttle!

Campus bus offers convenient service

BY MEGAN EASTON
The Queen's Journal

Do you find yourself walking from your classes to Waldron or west campus in miserable winter rain? You may want to look into the shuttle bus service.

The west campus shuttle bus is offering "a more solid, reliable service" to all Queen's students this year, according to Jean Royce Hall Council President Steve Morelli.

The shuttle service was initiated by the council several years ago because west campus students required transportation at night, after Kingston Area Transit hours ended.

Since September, the service has been operating with new hours and an expanded route. Morelli said the council "wanted to increase the hours because Sunday nights we found there was a great need for them."

On the new route the shuttle leaves west campus on the hour, stopping between the two phases of Jean Royce Hall if necessary, and proceeding on to John Orr Tower.

The next stop is Douglas Library, followed by Waldron Tower, Adelaide/Ban Righ Hall, Victoria Hall, McNeill House/Morris Hall, and Leonard Hall, before finally heading back to west campus. Students can wave down the shuttle between stops.

"Last year [the shuttle bus] basically just went to west campus, down University Avenue to Waldron, and came back up," said Morelli. "This year the difference is that it's going everywhere ... we're covering all the residences."

Another of this year's changes is the replacement of the school bus, safety on campus. He said, "I think that the shuttle service is an excellent alternative to the Alma Mater Society Walkhome Service. It's reliable ... it's safe [and] it'll be used in the winter."

He was quick to concede that the trail will not last for much more than the first few feet of the attacker's flight. But Gentile added that "it depends on how much spray is applied. Also, if the attacker just stands there and lets it drip off, it won't do much good. If he runs away, the trail may help. It just depends on the situation."

The final feature of DyeWitness is that the green dye stays on the skin for up to seven days in order to help police in identifying an attacker. However, Gentile said the green dye is not guaranteed to last for seven days. "It depends on the type of skin [the attacker has]," Gentile said.

"Some skin won't hold the dye for as long as others. Coarse skin holds it longer. When we first bought a sample, I sprayed it on my leg and it lasted for three days," said Gentile.

For anyone who plans on using Dye Witness for purposes other than self-defense, there is no danger of doing any serious damage to an individual, Gentile said. He declared that "it is a special formula that has been extensively tested. It is made of vegetable dyes and other natural ingredients."

Morelli said the possibility of further extending shuttle hours is a future possibility.

Bireen Manuel (Life Sciences '96) agreed that "[the shuttle service] is pretty good, because we always have a way of getting home."

The shuttle service is funded by several groups at Queen's, including the AMS, the Office of the Vice-Principal (Operations) and University Relations/MCRC, and the Office of the rector of Residences. Morelli said that the new shuttle service aims to "provide adequate service to main campus residents" as well as those on west campus.

He also said that if the expanded service is taken advantage of, it could potentially increase students' safety on campus.

A DyeWitness account

Self-defense product to identify attackers

BY ADAM EMERY
The Queen's Journal

Personal alarms and the student walk-home service are no longer the only means of night-time protection for students. There is now a new self-defense product on the market in the Kingston area called DyeWitness.

Queen's economics student Robert Gentile and St. Lawrence College student Adam Check have teamed up to provide what they perceive to be a useful product for walking the poorly-lit streets of Kingston.

Gentile described the product as a "small canister of pressurized dye. It is held comfortably in the palm of your hand."

According to Gentile, the spray serves to halt the attacker during an attack and aids in the identification of the perpetrator.

"There are three main features," he said. "When attacked, the spray gets into the eyes of the attacker. This gives the person the chance to run away."

"The product then foams up on contact and drips all over, it liquifies. Hopefully the attacker will leave a trail for the police to follow," said Gentile.

Morelli said that the new shuttle service aims to "provide adequate service to main campus residents" as well as those on west campus.

Student ready to take on US

Miss Fitness Ontario to compete in televised competition

BY THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL STAFF
The Queen's Journal

Nancy Greco is ready to take on America.

Greco, (Coni '94, Arts '96), left for Los Angeles yesterday to compete as the only Canadian in a field of 42 women taking part in the 1993 National Championships of the Fitness America competition this weekend.

The event, which has celebrity judging panel that includes pop star Marky Mark and actor Michael J. Fox, will be televised on American sports network ESPN, and re-broadcast in December on TSN.

"It might be very hard to win, as a Canadian," Greco said, in spite of Fox's presence at the judging panel. "But then again, the Jays did win the World Series—twice," she said.

The competitors will be judged on interviews, physical fitness and their routine. Greco's routine showcases her talent as a dancer, something she has done since she was six.

Greco has competed a number of times previously, winning Miss Fitness Ontario, Miss Can-Am, and placing second in a regional competition three weeks ago in Niagara Falls to qualify for this weekend's event.

Greco said she isn't expecting to win, and is taking part mainly for the experience, and to perhaps make some connections.

She has been rigorously training for the event, and spending two hours in the gym every day.

Greco said the competition will be fierce, and admits she is a little overwhelmed by the whole thing.

She also said she was a little disinformed at the sexism inherent at these events.

"It is a pageant," she said. "But it's good for women to be athletic and ... to compete."

She said she was going to be at a bit of a disadvantage, as much of her competition has used steroids or had breast implants or plastic surgery. Greco said she felt that that's not what the sport is all about, and it's something she hopes will change.

"You shouldn't have to look like a sexpot to win. It's about fitness. You don't see male athletes looking like sexpots, they're respected for their hard work. It should be the same for women."

He was quick to concede that the trail will not last for much more than the first few feet of the attacker's flight. But Gentile added that "it depends on how much spray is applied. Also, if the attacker just stands there and lets it drip off, it won't do much good. If he runs away, the trail may help. It just depends on the situation."

ASSEMBLY REPORT

BY JEFF GRAY
The Queen's Journal

Last Thursday night's Alma Mater Society Assembly, reeling from the resignation of Board of Directors Chair Catherine Emmer-son at the preceding Annual Corporate Meeting, at first passed, and then voted to reconsider its approval of the purchase of $35,000 of new computers for the AMS.

Assembly also discussed, not surprisingly, reporting resignations to Assembly, as well as the Parent Resource Centre.

Resignations

During discussion period Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Representative Mike Asselstine suggested that a motion be put forward to require all AMS resignations be brought to Assembly's attention.

"When someone resigns from a commission, Assembly should know," Asselstine said.

Internal Affairs Commissioner Bob Adderly said commissioners are bound to report their commis-sions activities to Assembly, and that this could be defined to include all resignations, if Assembly wished.

The $35,000 debate

AMS Vice-President (Operations) Tim Wilson put forward a motion for Assembly to approve the purchase of over $35,000 worth of computers for the AMS office, to be spent over three years. The money was to come from a so-called unal-located surplus of over $500,000.

Con-Ed President Pete Stuart said he was concerned that the AMS was buying machines that will soon be obsolete. The purchase would include eleven 386-model machines.

"Shouldn't we get something with a little more oomph?" he asked.

ASUS President Jenn Steves criticised the purchase itself. "It seems pretty extravagant at a time when budgets are tight," she said. Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin defended the purchase saying the new machines are "absolutely essential for my job."

Assembly at first passed the motion, but later in the evening, discus-sion on the topic was reopened.

Main Campus Residents Council President Warren Flannery asked why it was possible to use surplus funds to buy computers, but not to set up a daycare centre.

Wilson said the funds required to run a daycare centre would run from $30,000 to $50,000 per year for a childcare professional.

Several members of Assembly questioned how much information they had to make a decision on the computer purchase.

ASUS Vice-President Heath Grant said "we have become a rubber-stamping body rather than acting like elected officials."

Assembly then passed a motion to reconsider, which will see the proposal come forward again at the next meeting.

Parent Resource Centre: Not a child-friendly space

Queen's Mature Students Association Representative Jack Troughton said the AMS used "questionable judgement" in setting up the Parent Resource Centre. Troughton said many parents object to abuse awareness posters and pamphlets in the space, as they are a bad influence on children.

One poster, he said, features a man and a woman in bed "doing the dirty" with the caption: "How far will you go before you ask him to wear a condom?"

He also said the centre's operating hours are lacking. The centre is only open from 10 a.m. until 2 p.m.

"Realistically, the Parent Resource centre is a bunch of pamphlets on the wall," he said.

AMS Vice-President (University Affairs) Todd Minerson said the situation with the posters will be taken care of, as it is only a temporary situation.

And in this corner...

Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin said there is "a huge division between the society and corporate sides of the AMS."

Education Commissioner Clive Fielding said that while her commission provides free sensitivity training seminars for pub staff, committees are expected to pay the price when they use an AMS service, such as the Publishing and Copy Centre.

Nevin said they also received "rude treatment" when trying to book events at campus pubs.

Rector too casual

Filling in as speaker, Rector David Baar was reprimanded by Fielding for being too casual and referring to Assembly members by their first names. Baar was also referring to Engineering Society President Mark Simpson as "Bar"

Free to speak, not free to rape

Expressing his views on date rape was probably the dumbest thing Professor Martin Yaqzan could possibly have done. What was he thinking?

University campuses are probably the most politically correct places on the planet. So why would a university professor compose a letter - and send it to a campus newspaper for publication - that said date rape is a natural outlet for the sexual needs of young men? This is exactly what Professor of New Brunswick University of Mathematics Martin Yaqzan did.

He must have known his statements were not made in a vacuum. He must have expected a reaction. (His fee list for interviews proves this - it also adds to the moral repugnance of his actions.)

A reaction - and a suspension - is just what he got. His letter and the reaction - received front-page coverage in The Globe and Mail, third-page coverage in The Toronto Star, and was even covered on CNN.

The president of UNB responded by saying that Yaqzan had freedom of speech - just not irresponsible speech. This statement, and Yaqzan's suspension, poses some difficult questions.

Like date rape, freedom of speech is a hotly debated issue. Freedom of speech is quintessential to the democratic operation of any society. But, does this mean Yaqzan's suspension was unwarranted or unjust? Not necessarily so.

Like with anything else, with freedom of speech there are no absolutes. Every freedom is coupled with a responsibility. Simply letting the pig-headed bigots of society say whatever they want - because hey! it will expose them for what they really are - is a double-edged sword. The freedom to say date-rape is natural illustrates the type of thinking that opens the doors to the infringing of someone else's rights. And that is clearly not acceptable.

But does that mean Professor Yaqzan should lose his livelihood? Does the very nature of his livelihood affect the outcome of this question? Yaqzan's statements were made under the yoke of professor. He did not make his statements under just his name. Nor did he make his statements outside of the university environment. Instead, he deliberately addressed the Like with the case of Cedric Schubert, the Queen's Professor of Mathematics who was recently convicted of sexually assaulting his step-daughter in the early '80s, the university administration has a responsibility to provide a safe and comfortable learning environment for its students.

A professor who publicly and willingly defends - if not excuses - date rape is far from conducive to the creation of a safe and comfortable learning environment.

Professor Yaqzan must accept responsibility for his actions.

The real question, however, is how to put a stop to date rape. Quenching the voice of Professor Martin Yaqzan will not achieve that goal. Regardless of the appalling nature of his statements, they did raise awareness of the need to continue educating ourselves about the problem of date rape.

Although his suspension was avoidable, Yaqzan should continue to expound his beliefs - at least a method of teaching what should not be.

Meeting the Needs

Good intentions do not necessarily produce good things.

The Alma Mater Society Childcare Committee has finally got the Parent Resource Centre operational, but does it serve any purpose?

What started out as an honourable attempt to provide childcare facilities on campus over a year ago has become simply a "drop-in" centre for parents and their children.

What does the Centre do? The Parent Resource Centre provides information for parents to read. It also provides an alternate location to stimulate a child's interests with educational games and activities.

However, the Centre only does this between ten a.m. and two p.m. - a time when children need feeding. So how will parents utilize the four hours the Centre is actually open?

When considering changing the hours of operation, perhaps the committee should consider preliminary consultation with the students who will use the service. For the second year running, the Mature Students Association has criticized the Centre publicly.

This year, they criticized the Centre for both its hours of operation and the abuse awareness posters in the Centre. At AMS Assembly last week, Mature Students Association representative Jack Troughton discussed a poster that showed a man and woman engaged in sexual activity. The caption underneath read "How far will you go before you ask him to wear a condom?"

AMS Vice-President (University Affairs) Todd Minerson said the poster would be there only temporarily. But why was it there in the first place?

While the lack of awareness of the Resource Centre may suggest simply that the committee failed to advertise and encourage the use of the facilities by parents and students. However, it also seems to suggest that the Centre does not meet the needs of its potential users.

It appears that during the planning stages other crucial considerations were overlooked as well. It was not until this year that the Childcare Committee found out that to legally provide day care services, an officially trained employee is required.

The need for an officially trained employee naturally translates into the necessity to pay someone, something the Committee and the AMS does not seem prepared to do. This, obviously, seriously reduces the effectiveness of the service.

Why is the AMS not willing to provide a full-functioning daycare service?

There seems to be an abundance of unallocated money left in the AMS bank account which could easily fund a paid employee. A trial period sponsored by the AMS would determine the viability and popularity as well as the costs of the service. Knowing this information would put the AMS in a position to propose a daycare student interest fee or reserve room in the budget.

While provincial coffers are strapped, further financial support may come from the Ontario Government. Hopefully this avenue will be explored before the AMS Childcare Committee decides the present service is the best they can offer.

The decision to settle for a "drop-in" service instead of a "drop-off" service - despite the expenditure on following a path of secularism in the hopes that a religion-free environment will improve humanity.

The Service of Remembrance is aptly titled since it is a reminiscent opportunity to speak religiously while gathered together as a whole Queen's community. Those in Grant Hall were able to share in the power of communal prayer. It is a shame that these opportunities are so few on campus, because religion provides meaning and purpose in life at a time when students are so desperately seeking their own 'calling.'

Far from being "pointless," as The Journal editorial asserts, the plebiscite results did dictate the voting of the student members of Faculty Board at the October 20 Faculty Board meeting. Furthermore, the overwhelming support for the retention of the name "Faculty of Applied Science" has provided us with a mandate to continue our lobbying efforts to overturn the Faculty Board decision.

We were quite surprised to read the allegations made within the editorial, the Engineering Society has sent out several press releases and participated in two AMS sponsored press conferences about this issue. Moreover, The Journal itself ran a story about the Faculty name change and associated controversy ("What's in a name?"). Fri. Nov. 5/93 only a week prior to their editorial. We can only hope that The Journal will edit their editorials more carefully in the future.

The motion to change the name of the Faculty of Applied Science originated within the Faculty Board, not the Engineering Society. Because the student members of the Board did not feel that they had a clear mandate on a "student position" for this matter, the Engineering Society decided to hold a plebiscite vote to determine the wishes of its constituents.

The plebiscite (which the AMS defines as a referendum in which the outcome is non-binding) was held in conjunction with the AMS fall referendum on October 13 and 14. At no time could the results of the voting be considered binding, since the Engineering Society does not possess the authority to change the name of the Faculty. However, the eight student representatives on Faculty Board (including ourselves as representatives of the Engineering Society) declared our intention to vote on the Faculty Board motion in a manner consistent with the outcome of the plebiscite.

The results of the Plebiscite were as follows:

Faculty of Applied Science: 458 votes (73.0% of total ballots cast), Faculty of Engineering: 47 votes (7.5% of total ballots cast), Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering: 84 votes (13.4% of total ballots cast), Faculty of Engineering and Applied Science: 35 votes (5.6% of total ballots cast), Spoiled Ballots: 3 (0.5% of total ballots cast).

At the October 20 meeting of the Faculty Board, a motion to change the name of the Faculty from "Faculty of Applied Science" to "Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering" was passed by a single vote.

As the author of "FINAL WARNING," I would like to reiterate my own interests. But to respond to the label of "irresponsible" speech is troublesome indeed. It would certainly be unfair of me to demand that all transfer or grad students completely disassociate themselves from their previous universities. After all, you did spend four years there and you undoubtedly have some very fond memories of your previous schools. Secondly, I must agree with you on one point. Tradition or not, it is ridiculous to spend hundreds of dollars on a jacket and then run it over or paint it purple. Also, no one should feel pressured to purchase a jacket that they cannot afford. (Incidentally, I have resisted the urge to purchase a school jacket this year.) Thirdly, no one has ever occurred to me that there may be another university that is better than Queen's. Queen's is and don't you ever forget it. I will now close with a new warning.

Remembering Religion

I recently attended the Service of Remembrance held in Grant Hall on November 11. The service (especially the music) was beautiful, but I was also keenly aware that this was a rare occasion for religion to be acknowledged on campus. As we stood in silence I could not help but think that we were also participating in a dying rite of religious expression. Religion has been relegated to the status of an idiosyncrasy by the secular world-view of academia. Discussion of 'values,' 'morality,' and 'meaning' is considered outdated, irrelevant, and politically incorrect. Relativism is the replacement for the Absolute. It is said that at Queen's University, where traditions are cherished and honored, the religious heritage of its founders is ignored and covered up as an embarrassing remnant from the past. Queen's seems to be

Trudeau: Memoirs
Pierre Elliott Trudeau
McClelland and Stewart
$35.00
371 pages

Politics should be read from a biased perspective. A blatantly biased one. One that says, "this is what I think, this is where I'm coming from, disagree with me if you dare." Politics (especially Canadian politics) are much more interesting when authors don't pretend to be objective or to be expounding some great truths, but instead simply put forth perspectives that they hold, and let the masses duke it out.

If you did this on the corner of Princess and Division, people would call you crazy, and shuffle past you as quickly as possible. If you do it in the Opinions section of The Journal, people write lots of letters and vehemently disagree with you, and then with each other. But if your name is Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and you do it in 371 glossy pages packed with 253 well-reproduced photographs, (106 of them in colour) and get it published and put in the front window of bookstores everywhere, they'll make you a god.

And Trudeau is about as close to God as a Canadian politician has ever been or ever will be — at least in his own mind.

Canada has an obsession with Trudeau — he spent almost 16 years (minus the 9 month blip that was Joe Clark) in office from 1968 to 1984. And it is this political life, this political persona, to which his memoirs are largely dedicated.

It's not even an autobiography as such (could he do anything the normal way?), since it came out of a series of interviews conducted in English and French by various journalists, then edited and revised by Trudeau. The failure to recognize that the shape of the book is determined by the questions asked is not all that important — it's pretty clear that Trudeau talks about the issues that he wants to clear up, and ignores those that he considers unimportant (or maybe personally damaging).

What that amounts to is, in essence, a defense of everything that he has ever done in his political life. From the world travels that shaped his life before he entered politics, to the FLQ crisis, to the patriation of the Constitution, the entire book comes across as a justification of his decisions.

His explanations range from outlining the options available to him, and arguing for the wisdom of his decisions, to ridiculing those who would dare disagree with him.

The captions for many of the photos are also an opportunity for self-promotion. Jamaican Prime Minister Michael Manley is quoted as saying, "by training and instinct, [Trudeau] believes mankind's best hopes lie in reason, persuasion, accommodation, seeing the other fellow's point of view. To these qualities he adds the breadth of vision and sense of history that make the true internationalist." Trudeau adds, "obviously, a very generous description." When it's your own book, you evidently don't have to print quotes that do not include "a very generous description."

He quotes John Lennon as saying that "if all politicians were like Mr. Trudeau, there would be world peace" and continues by saying that he himself always thought "give peace a chance" to be good advice. He obviously didn't think that advice was so persua-though he says he doesn't want to criticize him at all, and downplays, to a certain extent, the influence that he himself had on Meech Lake and Charlottetown debates.

What is more interesting is the post-Trudeau doesn't mention — almost no one in the Liberal Party whom he didn't work directly. Jean Chretien is mentioned only briefly, and not in reference to the fact that he was Liberal leader when the book was written. Trudeau also neglects to evaluate, in recent election, the present political climate or the rise of the Reform Party and the Bloc.

The format of the book gives it a great heft that it actually should have. Not only is it jam-packed with the fascinating picture family canoe trips and group photos from Commonwealth conferences, but the text itself is made to look as big as humanly possible. The print is large enough to read in bed, across the room, and the inside margins are about two and a half inches wide. So don't be intimidated by the almost 400 pages — it really reads like about 200 pages, and a 200 at that.

But don't get me wrong. It's a great read in the same way that Doritos are a great snack. There are things with more substance than Doritos to be doing, but sometimes nothing more fun.

✚ JAMES KEAST voted for Cookie Keast in the last election, and is now collecting quotes and photos for his own memoirs.

A review copy of Trudeau's book was provided courtesy of Printed Passage Books.

sive when he invoked the War Measures Act during the FLQ crisis.

The justification of Trudeau's actions during that crisis is based on the idea that Canada itself would have descended into terrorism and anarchy if he hadn't acted. He offers little evidence of this, except by quoting other people who agree with him, but often attacks his critics for not backing up their claims. I know, I know, they're his memoirs, he can use them to justify mistakes and attack critics if he likes.

The book is more a political history than a personal biography — his marriage to Margaret receives one paragraph and the divorce is not mentioned at all. He also fails to include accounts of incidents such as the "fuddle-duddle" incident (where he said something inappropriate in Parliament but refused to repeat it to the press), or other moments that might diminish his pristine image.

He limits his criticism of "Mulroneyism" to his thoughts on the constitution, even

The cliché says that "a picture can say a thousand words." The best pictures are those that can express some of one's own words. The portrait on the cover of the Queen's Feminist Review allows for such expressive interpretations. The posture of the little girl is suggestive of a pose, but her eyes and her facial expression give her away: she is not going to acquiesce to the imposed posture and subvert her individuality that easily — she must be a feminist. Perhaps it is her eyes that indicate that there is much underlying the cover — thoughtful essays, humorous fiction and some poetry.

The essays are the strength of the journal. In one of the most impressive essays, "Reel Phobia: Hollywood, Lesbian Representation, and the Lesbian Gaze," Suzanne Sutton describes how Hollywood filmmaking constructs the "male gaze" as the primary spectator position and (mis)represents lesbian women as the "other". When lesbians do not experience erasure in Hollywood movies, they are represented as deviant, dangerous or subordinate. However, Sutton argues, Hollywood's inability to represent lesbian relationships positively does not reside solely in the text. The dialogue between the text and the spectator is not conducive to lesbian-positive readings. Taking the examples of The Colour Purple and Fried Green Tomatoes, Sutton suggests that lesbian relationships are subverted and representations of lesbian desire are connected with abuse in order to "assuage the anxieties [of] the heterosexual majority." Sutton argues that the "lesbian gaze" is an "important theoretical construct"; however, there is no universal "lesbian gaze." Positive lesbian representations and accommodation of the "lesbian gaze" in film will need to meet the challenge of avoiding Hollywood's tendency to speak for the "other." Sutton's paper is a thought-provoking analysis of the ways in which filmmakers deny "lesbian gazes" and the challenges implicit in providing a satisfying place for the "lesbian gaze" to rest.

A second essay on film theory is written by Catherine Lunardon. She examines "sexploitation" films which present women as highly exploited; in particular, she looks at the film She Devils on Wheels. Lunardon suggests that the film, despite its efforts at objectification and accommodation of male heterosexual fantasies, provides the potential for subversion. In many instances, the gaze is female. Women are not referenced on men, but the converse: women are the subjects. In She Devils on Wheels the main female characters challenge patriarchy and the value system which objectifies women. Lunardon contends that subversion and alternative readings of desire within the context of the conventions and codes of dominant cinema could represent one of the best prospects for feminist cinema. She presents a convincing case for her position.

Perhaps one of the most valuable contributions that the Review makes is its exploration of race and its relationship with gender and feminism. In "Woman as Child-bearer in Buchi Emecheta's The Joy's Motherhood," Gillian Mann describes how women in Ibo society in Nigeria are defined by their essential role as mothers. The desire of women to produce male children had the dual effect of disempowering women and depriving women of their identity if their efforts to bear children were unsuccessful. This look at Ibo culture is interesting in itself and illuminating in regard to the functioning of patriarchy in our own culture.

In "Japanese-Canadian Women: A Note on the 'Picture-Book Bride,'" Kelly Grewal discusses the historical situation of Japanese-Canadian women in Canada prior to and during the second world war and the specificity of their experiences. She argues that in studies of racism it is important to look at how gender is employed and manipulated. Men and women do not experience racism in the same way. Japanese-Canadian women were victims of racism that focused their ability to reproduce and the suppression

Atwood's wit delights crowd

Celebrated Canadian author reads in Kingston

"This is going to be a pretty strange reading," Margaret Atwood laughed at herself as she bent over and attempted to take out her contact lenses.

"Just nobody sneeze!" she joked.

Atwood's keen sense of humour and ability to improvise delighted a crowd last Wednesday night at the Ambassador Hotel.

The reading, part of her year-long book tour across Canada, the U.S., England and Germany, was sponsored by Printed Passage Books as part of their Fall Authors Series.

Tickets to see the Ottawa-born author, who has published some 25 books in over 25 countries, sold out months ago. A recipient of numerous awards, Atwood has come to represent many things for Canadians. Her books reveal both her sense of irony and her love for the land. Her most recent novel, The Robber Bride, offers an unclouded vision of childhood and a comic comment on all of humanity.

Atwood got her audience's attention and approval right from the start. She had forgotten her reading glasses and marked her copy of The Robber Bride in the wrong place, but used this situation to her advantage and evoked much laughter with her deliberate antics. She fumbled with the microphone, but the large book just inches away from her face, and finally began to read.

The first passage revealed the significance of her current novel's title. She then introduced her characters, explaining how the novel focuses upon the lives of three female friends. One of her characters is ambidextrous, and Atwood teased the audience: "She writes backwards, and so you'll have to read backwards. I have a whole new following of people who can do this!"

She continued to read a passage depicting a child's first tobogganing experience. Hauntingly true to life, Atwood's imagery in the novel often shifts from comical to violent. She thus succeeds in illustrating both the sweetness and the harshness of reality.

Atwood's final choice passage from The Robber Bride was a description of her main characters' luncheon date at their favourite cafe in Toronto. Her reading ended with an eerie twist — the implication that these three women would always be joined by the spirit of their life-long tormenter. Always quick of wit, however, Atwood assured her audience that before this scene "each of these people gets up in the morning and has a good breakfast. I make sure of that. I feel everyone should have a good breakfast."

With this, Atwood offered to answer any questions. She explained that she is now on a book tour until April, as she has not done one in five years. Admitting that it is tiring but rewarding, she reflected upon the idea of having a machine take her place. "I'm looking forward to virtual reality ... I can make myself into a virtual reality package and let the package do the tour!"

Atwood later expressed her inability to master machines when she related some of her high school experiences to the audience. She explained that she took home economics instead of typing because "in those days the people who took typing had very thin eyebrows and smoked in the washroom. Home Ec and I were not suited to each other, however — reason being my Home Ec teacher cared what the clothes looked like on the inside." Atwood now uses "the most idiot-proof word processing program, [because] I just need a typewriter smarter than me."

The Robber Bride was written in several different locations with the use of that "idiot-proof" computer. Atwood lived with her family in France in three consecutive houses and wrote about two-thirds of the novel in these homes. She also wrote part of it surrounded by wolf pictures and statues in a home once owned by a wolf-catcher, another part on the Trans-Canada train with her computer plugged into the wall socket, and other sections in a log cabin in the Beaver Valley — by candlelight, because the lights often went out.

When asked why more women than men had come out that evening to hear her read, Atwood expressed a belief that women simply read more novels than men, and that they also choose novels written by females more often than men do. She simply writes what pleases her, she explained, and mused that it is easier for her to write for women because she knows them better. She firmly believes, however, that someday she will gain more male readers. "If you're dead you become more respectable. I expect my male readership to grow when I croak."

Atwood certainly should not fear losing any readers, however. The pleased expressions on her fans' faces as they lined up to meet her and buy her autographed book confirmed this. Most likely they were all thinking how glad they are that she didn't stick with Home Ec.

threat that implied. The interment of Japanese-Canadian persons was a gendered experience and the experiences of women were unique. Grewal is one of the few to give adequate attention to the relevancy of gender in the Japanese-Canadian experience.

Stacy Dillon in "The Place of Race in Feminist Theory: Women of Colour Are Calling for Change," acknowledges that the onus is on white women to address racism and that all oppression is different. We need to understand racism as a different sort of oppression, not just another oppression. Dillon points out that black women advance feminism and provide prospects for change in ways that Eurocentric feminists do not. Black feminists provide a new way of talking about feminism and a new way of interrelating with one another at the same time as they expose the elitism that is inherent in the way some feminists engage in theory. White feminists could help devise new ways of conceiving of ideas, new ways of engaging in political action and learn to recognize their own racism. Dillon is hopeful about the prospect of engaging in theorizing in more egalitarian ways.

The three essays that address issues of race and gender and feminism enable the Queen's Feminist Review to make a valuable contribution to an issue that is not addressed often enough in feminist theory. The essays also highlight the extent to which race is experienced differently by different women. In some ways these are the most meaningful discussions in the journal.

There are essays from the disciplines of political science and philosophy, and both are provocative and informative. In "Feminism and International Relations Theory: Allies or Enemies?" Natalie Macdonald provides an overview and analysis of the influence of feminist theory and gender on international relations theory. She draws the conclusion that the lack of consensus among feminists about proposals for change is not problematic because it might help to transform international relations theory into a truly representative theory. Macdonald writes, "clearly, feminists worldwide are beginning to recognize that the different experiences of women must be acknowledged and the idea of a universal oppression or patriarchal system must be challenged." Louise Noble, in "Here Lies Not-Woman": Veils and Tombs in Nietzsche's The Birth of Tragedy," presents a beautifully written critique of the role of women in Nietzsche's work. Her conclusion is that the representation of women is anti-feminist, absent of the mother and not woman. It is a representation that promotes the interests of men and in so doing "tightens the link to Socratic rationalism." Both essays make worthwhile reading.

The compilation also contains six poems. My personal favourite was "If the Moon Smiled" in which Laura Panter elicits strong emotional responses with powerful imagery. The poetry is what one might expect from a student publication.

A few pieces of fiction are interspersed among the essays and the poetry. All are good and well-written; particularly worthy of mention are "Cooking at Queen's" by Bobbi Sparks and "The Pig" by Jen Evans. On the surface, "Cooking at Queen's" is a lighthearted comparison of cooking with academics, but a closer look will reveal some serious criticisms of academic institutions and the work they do. "The Pig" is a short story about the seemingly unusual behaviour of a woman in her role as a housewife and her husband's increasing anger at her behaviour. Underlying the humour is a thoughtful critique of interpersonal relationships and the power that is entailed in particular roles. The short stories provide balance by offsetting the seriousness of the essays and are a welcome addition to the compilation.

The Queen's Feminist Review is the first issue of what could be a long history of publication of writing by undergraduate women at Queen's University. It is in the format of an academic journal and was organized and edited by Queen's students, and is available for free from the AMS office. There is enough variety in both style and content to appeal to most readers.

Poetry from the Queen's Community

ON AUGUST 16, 1993, a tragic fire stole the lives of my three-year-old nephew, my two-year-old and nine-year-old nieces, as well as the lives of three other small children. My sister-in-law (to be), her husband and their sole remaining son have lost their house and all of their possessions. This series of poems was written in the two months following the fire.

—A.J.

A Whisper and a Scream

The green of the trees screamed life
When the rest of the day whispered anything but.
Something so precious, so fragile
Once so sturdy and taken for granted.
Minutes pass
But time means nothing for some
For her, everything.

My beautiful angel
My Jade

Every blink of mine gives hope in a hopeless situation.

Talk To You Later

How dare you stand in that hallway and laugh your booming laugh
While I sit here as death surrounds me, encases me in sorrow, becomes me.

How dare you bring your baby around me when all I can do is look at her blond hair and green eyes with envy.

I am Jade with envy.

My tears slip off my chin and onto your calloused hands that move abnormally from mixed messages
I beg you to kick-start your brain or else mine might stop working too as I squeeze a teddy bear brought to you by someone who's never heard you say
"Talk to you later, A!"

Don't Thank Me

If I made a million
cuticle rings for you will you come back to us?
A hundred thousand wrappers from cigarette packs can't make a tiny body rise from the dead
but in my mind you are still here.

We danced the night away
'til you slept to the sound of that loathed country music
And I carried you upstairs for the last time

Don't thank me for the things I have done—mere favours they were not.
It was a pleasure to have known you.
(too formal? maybe I should say "talk to you later")

You Were Too Young to Drive

My heart laughs when I think of you sitting on your uncle's knee
as he teases you and you giggle.

My eyes smile when I remember you driving the Bronco into the fence and crying as you told me that you were too young to drive.

My mind rejoices when I see your tiny face make a cute face and then an ugly face before you go through my wallet and ask me to swing you in the kitchen.

My body heaves as suppressed tears tell me it is no longer to be.

It Seems Like Forever

Two months have passed
and it seems like forever since I've seen you all
I would give my life
to swing you in my arms,
read a story to you,
or help you with your times tables.
I would give my life
to be back on the beach with the warm sun and the cool breeze and the innocent sand castles.
I would give my life
to see your beautiful blue eyes, your irreplaceable smile,
your purple everything.
I would give my life.

Two months have passed
And it seems like forever

Animal Death

A short story by Robin Kelsey

antique music box

Annie likes to sit in the kitchen in the evening like real farmers, talking about the day over coffee and biscuits. Her vision is like an old engraving or an antique music box.

"I made soup out of bones," Annie says. "I sat on the hill like a rock. I watched the cows."

"What?"
"I saw rodent death."
"You're scaring me," Annie says.

the beginning

"We're moving to the country!" we announced, like a style of clothing, a trend in music, an interesting diversion: anything but the next desperate phase in our complicated lives. The truck broke down a mile from the gate and we pushed it into the ditch to rot, like some monstrous mulch. The animals trotted beside us (cat family, collie dog), clutching at straws, full of hope again.

the cows

"Co-boss! Co-boss!" Jack Morton bayed, and the cows lumbered in from the fields to be counted. There were sixteen of them. We paid Jack Morton thirty dollars a month for forty acres and a house without electricity or water, as long as we kept an eye on the cows. Jack said any calf born in the swamp would be dead in a day, eaten by blackflies. The little herd ate grass all day and was mildly entertaining, like television.

collie family

Sarah dog had her puppies in the darkest corner of the woodshed. Three were dead when Annie found them in the morning, limp fur pillows with naked bellies, tiny soft ribs. Annie fixed up a bed of towels in a fruit basket and Sarah went out to kill a groundhog. The puppies cried and slept. Sarah came back and buried herself in her dirty hole. Annie winced at the sound of splintering groundhog bones.

"Why doesn't she feed them? Can't she hear them crying?"
"Maybe you shouldn't have moved them."

"They can't stay in that dirty hole."
"Sarah knows what to do."
"We'll have to take them inside and feed them with an eyedropper," Annie said, forsaking the boundaries of reason.

I poured the pups out of the fruit basket into the hole. They were drawn to Sarah's teats by powerful magnets.
"Some of them aren't getting any milk. They'll die."

"There are too many pups! Some of them are supposed to die."
Annie stabbed me with a look and I went out to the barn, whose cathedral space was filled with a serene and healing kind of light. Two more puppies died before noon, but the survivors grew like yeast.

I buried the dead pups at the foot of the garden, a sullen disturber of the earth.

cow surveillance

Annie makes soup out of bones she gets for free in town. They are dog bones but are not the bones of dogs. She boils the bones in the yard over an open fire while I sit on the hill like a rock.

The soup is delicious. Without it we would die. Annie is not happy. I eye the cows, noting their habits, their weaknesses, for future reference.

the bear

We were sitting in Jack Morton's kitchen having coffee and biscuits when the beagle dog howled. Jack and his grim wife Loreen sprang into action, plucking shotguns from the wall and herding us into the back of their Ford truck, where we rattled like pebbles across the hayfield. One shot sounded and the truck lurched to a stop beside the corpse of a black bear.

The shot was not as loud as I had imagined gunshots to be, and the bear (diminished by death) was smaller than zoo bears. Blood seeped from a hole in its neck. "One shot! A hundred yards!" Jack crowed.

"Forty yards," Loreen said, spilling the steaming guts out onto the ground. Jack wanted us to put our fingers in the hole in the bear's neck, but Annie retched in the weeds. "City girl," Loreen said.

process of decay

We attacked the garden with good energy, but soon the open sore on the face of the land became a symbol of our sickness. It was Annie who finally planted the seeds.

"There's too much of everything," I chided. "You can't even walk between the rows. Too many radishes, too many peas!"
"You plant it then."

Everything grew, despite our sullen neglect: stunted carrots, peas locked in a vicious death struggle. We ate what we could but decay was faster, and most of the vegetables returned to the earth.

coffee and biscuits

"You're off someplace all day and I'm alone in the house. You go up the hill in the morning and when you come back you have nothing to say. It's just like in the city, the silence and the loneliness. You have to talk to me," Annie says.

"Nothing happens to me on the hill!"
"Your silence is a weapon against love."
"What are we doing here?"

"I don't know. We're here. Here we are," Annie says, putting her finger right on it.

cat family

Mama Cat gives hunting lessons in the barn, bringing fear-crazed chipmunks for the kittens to practice on. Annie hates the barn, but I often sit in the loft and watch the grisly sport. Severed tails litter the floor. Mama Cat purrs and rubs herself against my knees, her whiskers beaded with chipmunk gore.

truck drivin' man

Jack Morton slams his Ford around the back roads with a bottle of rye under the seat, raging against the song he's in, one about trucks, sadness, infidelity and death. He was expecting something different from life.

shopping day

The road to town winds past poor farms where children dangle plastic tractors in frozen images of play. Annie, never a walker, tires after a mile, but there is nothing I can do to shorten the road.

"We'll rest when we get to the birch trees," I say. "See the birch trees?"

"You jerk."

Tired sullen Annie orders pie and milkshakes while I wash up. In the fluorescent mirror I don't know myself. We stroll past the shops and nod to the old men on the benches, who quiver with ancient lust for Annie, her soft arms.

Kids with fishing poles, eyes like cold saucers, watch us drink wine on the river bank. We are visitors from another land, where things are no longer as they seem.

cow death

"I think maybe they kill cows at the slaughterhouse with one blow of a huge hammer. Or maybe they use electricity, or a thin knife. I don't know how they do it. I found this big sledge behind the barn. It's a little rusty."

"Why would you want to kill a cow?"

"That's what they're for. They're made out of meat."

"These are dairy cows! They're Jack's cows. They look nice under the elm tree."

"Annie," I say. "Nice is not enough."

higgledy-piggledy, home again

"I can't walk back," Annie says.

"Yes you can."

"I'm tired and drunk. Let's knock on a door and ask somebody to drive us. We can pay them for their gas."

"No!"

"Well, I will."

A woman in a flowered dress drives us home. I am speechless with embarrassment. She is very nice and won't take any money, but stops for tea. The yard is thick with animals.

"The old Morton place," the woman says.

I have forgotten to feed the cats and dogs or to water the cows, who mill around the pump, mooing expectantly. A kitten squeals, crushed by a cow. Annie cries out in horror and shame, and the woman flees.

I place the meagre remains of the kitten in the earth. Part of the day has been a good day and part of it has not.

bandits

Annie plays Bach on the old pump organ and I try to read, but it's too loud; many of the pipes are sour, and the chaste fugues seem a leering mockery of prayer. The house is a sweltering nightmare land, its curtains drawn against the sun. Fleeing outdoors I find the cows raiding the garden.

I have pursued clarity in my life; I have spurned chaos. Chaos has not been welcome at my table. But there was chaos, smirking over the soup, drooling on the tablecloth.

Slapping at blackflies I wade among the bovine bandits, who eye me gravely and nibble the young corn shoots. "Co-boss," I plead, waving my arms and jumping up and down. I point a cow's head at the gate, using her horns as handles, and she begins to move that way; the others follow like molasses, rolling their huge soft eyes, kicking down the fence, squashing the tomatoes.

I dance and shriek and flap my arms, blackflies chew my ears, mad Bach reels out through the curtains into the blazing sky.

Chaos triumphs.

soft arms

I share the hill with wind and insects, the secret life of the land. Annie finishes boiling the bones and pokes up the fire in the yard down below. I watch like a rock as she strips naked and soaps her tender body. I might rush down from the hill, whooping like a gibbon, and tumble the slippery familiar body in the weeds, but do not. I do not.

spies

Here come Howard and Janice, up for the weekend in their blue Honda to gather wildflowers and chop wood, peering at our lives like eager students of decay. "What happened to this garden?" Howard says. Howard, my city friend. "When are you going to stake the tomatoes? You should really fix this fence."

"It's not like Harrowsmith."

"Need to start getting wood in if you want to stay the winter. Maybe insulate the attic."

"Annsulate the attic," I foolishly mumble.

"What are these chipmunk tails doing here?"

"The cats... process of decay... animal death..."

"Do you know there's a dead calf in the swamp?"

"Oh God. I didn't do it. Don't tell Jack Morton, don't tell Annie!"

what time is it?

"Maybe if we got a car," I say.

"It's too late."

"No, really, we could go into town more, eat better food. Catch a movie maybe. Meet people."

"It's too late."

"Jack's got an old Pontiac I can get. It needs some work."

"Too late."

"What do you mean?"

"Too late! It's too late! It's just too good-dam late!" Annie says.

the end

I watch like a rock as the pale sky fills with stars and the cows begin their evening circuit of the hill. Howard strums his gay guitar at the bonfire far below. Annie and Janice toss suitcases into the blue Honda. Mist rolls up from the swamp and the cows come like phantoms, eating their way to the place where I stand with my hammer, angry and bleeding and strong, a folk tale figure of death.

Annie gets in the Honda and goes, and then only the sighing, murmuring cow song breaks my dreaming silence. I might bring my hammer down on the forehead of a cow, who grunts and falls to her knees. The broad bones would splinter like great walnuts, like crab shells, like long porous bones of dogs. Black blood might spurt from her nostrils and her eyes. She wheezes once, a great sigh, as her living cow spirit leaves her.

The others glance and pass on, as indifferent as comets to this enormous, perfect, dreadful event. I might lean against the cooling bod of the flesh of my cow to dream of salt, smoke, ice: weapons in the war against decay.

But I do not.

QMA SPEAKERS A REVIEW

Warner Lambert Speakers Series: "North American Success Stories"

Ted Fletcher
President, Starter Canada

Ted Fletcher, the President of Starter Canada, was the first speaker from the Warner Lambert Speaker Series: "North American Success Stories" to address QMA members this term. Fletcher spoke to a standing room only crowd at Dunning on October 5th.

Starter, the largest privately held apparel company in the world, was founded when Fletcher, with daring audacity and brilliant entrepreneurial spirit, flew to New York city and managed to acquire all of the Canadian Headware Licensing Rights for the NHL, NFL, NBA, North American Soccer League, and the National Baseball League! Today, Starter is at the hub of the seven billion dollar professional sports league business.

Fletcher emphasized throughout his speech that the essence of his own success story represents the fundamental principle behind Starter. Fletcher left his audience with the Starter philosophy which clearly reflects this: "It's up to you. When you start with a dream."

Sam Joseph
Director of Training, McDonalds Canada

Sam Joseph, the McDonalds Director of Training for Canada and Russia was the second speaker from the Warner Lambert Speaker Series to come to Queen's this term. Joseph spoke enthusiastically and candidly about "what makes McDonalds tick" to a full room in Ellis Hall.

Joseph identified in his discussion several key factors which he felt had helped to make McDonalds a worldwide success. Among these were the belief that everyone involved in the process needs to feel important — both the customers and the employees; that they must always strive to be better at being the best; and that in order to be truly successful you need to be daring, different, and first.

Joseph also encouraged his audience in their quest for success to seek strong leadership, to have a simple and flexible business form, and single-mindedness within their vision.

Unilever Speaker Series: "Towards 2000 — Gaining a Competitive Advantage in Today's Changing World"

Andre Kerkovius
Director, Mountain Equipment Co-op

Andre Kerkovius, Queen's Law '88, travelled from Calgary a few weeks ago to speak to members of the QMA about Mountain Equipment Co-op. An avid climber and outdoors person, Kerkovius was nominated for a volunteer directorship three years ago. Since then, he has watched the co-op expand across Canada as it increases in success.

Kerkovius discussed how this success is primarily based on the quality and price of their products. They believe strongly in offering only products of the greatest value to their members. In order to make the best cycling jacket possible, one of the directors cycled to work every day in a jacket that he designed. Every time he felt something was not right or could be improved, he brought it into the Co-op to be altered. The result? As Kerkovius stated - a top quality jacket at a reasonable price.

Mountain Equipment Co-op is a Canadian company that will definitely continue to succeed and excel far into the future.

James W. Benson
President, Thomas J. Lipton

James Benson spoke to QMA members on Wednesday night about the structure, success, and challenges which face Thomas J. Lipton. Benson stressed throughout his speech the importance for today's consumer to recognize a company's Canadian commitment. For instance, Benson stressed that Thomas J. Lipton is a company which has been established in Canada for over one hundred years, and furthermore, is one which does 95% of its sales manufacturing within Canada.

Benson identified as some of the primary issues and challenges facing companies today as: the immigration of "non-traditional" consumers, the increased competition from the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Pacific Rim, and also the rising costs and rising competition for companies operating in Canada.

Benson saw Lipton's ability to face such challenges as well as the company's competitive edge as stemming from the people who work within the company and their principles of excellence in serving the customer.

Winner Of The Mountain Equipment Co-op Jacket!

The Director of the Speakers Division Speaks

The Speakers Division would like to thank those who attended our speakers this semester. It is due to you that they were such a great success. We look forward to seeing you next semester when we will be presenting speakers from: Much Music, IBM, SPAR Aerospace, and Labatt's. I would also like to extend my congratulations to those who won door prizes, and to remind those of you who were not as lucky that will be many more prizes next semester!

Once again, thank you for your support.

Blues get spiked twice

BY TED GRAHAM
 The Queen's Journal

Eat it, Blue.
 Crass but accurate, Queen's fans told the U of T Blues men's volleyball team what they could do with the weekend's effort.
 The Gaels swept two matches over the weekend, winning a tight five set affair 3-2 (9-15, 15-11, 15-11, 5-15, 16-14) on Friday, and then turning up the intensity to finish Toronto by a 3-0 (15-13, 15-9, 15-4) margin on Saturday.

The victories put Queen's at 4-0 overall, and ties them with York at the top of the Ontario East. Spectators did their part for the win as Queen's setter Kevin "Cheese Nibbler" Chiswell brought his own cheering section in the form of four housemates. The exuberant quartet implored him not only to win but also to wash the dishes when he got home.

Head referee Dale Huddleston did his best to quell the more vigorous outbursts on Friday. But in the end, it was the quarrelling of the U of T coaching staff which convinced the Ernestown coach and part-time ref (Huddleston) to decline his next scheduled day on the stand. Saturday's match was filled with incompetent refereeing and unnecessary delays.

Queen's coach Brenda Willis, granting that the delays were a result of using an untrained scorekeeper, indicated that she felt the refereeing did not affect the outcome of the match.

After all, Queen's was leading 2-0 in games and were ahead 9-2 in the third when the protest was lodged.

David "Kill King" Kantor led the Golden Gaels offensively with a two match total of 38 kills while Mike Spence did the job handling the serve reception. When poor Queen's travels to Guelph this coming weekend for an invitational tournament, and are back in Kingston on Friday Nov. 26 to play Ryerson in their next home match at 9 p.m. in the PEC.

Rugby rules again

BY DAVE SPENCE
 The Queen's Journal

What a difference a year makes. Let us reminisce back to this time last year. The Queen's rugby lads had just lost their first OUAAs championship in seven years, and in the unluckiest of circumstances—a demoralizing 16-15 loss to that most hated of rivals, McMaster. The implications of this loss shook the rugby world to its very foundations. Was Queen's well publicized aura of invincibility finally crushed? Was the legend dead?

Having to face the dizzying consequences of this historic loss, the rugby boys were a bitter and moody group. Some took this loss harder than others: Peaches claimed that Bart no longer had that winning smile; wec Kevy O'Shea actually gave up booze and sex (at least with members of the opposite sex); and, horror of horrors, Seb got abs.

In this tense atmosphere training camp began, early as always. Before camp ended Queen's was to claim their first major victory: Al Ferguson, that guru of rugby knowledge who had led Queen's to its six consecutive OUAAs championships, agreed to lead the squad to the promised land. And what a squad it was shaping up to be. A solid and dedicated veteran core led the charge, but was bolstered by one of the strongest rookie crops in years. A dejected Rich Child was heard to mumble, "Where the hell did all these young bucks come from."

Things were looking promising for Queen's at both the first and second team level. However, as giant veteran forward Natholimit Truck pointed out, "Potential doesn't win championships."
 Queen's started the season with two solid victories, against Guelph on their home ground and then over Mac at home. The message had been sent, and the rest of the league shuddered as they realized Queen's had returned to their powerhouse ways. A fast, skilled and well groomed set of backs were complemented by a mobile and committed pack.

 Midway through the season Queen's presented the rest of the competition with their only chink of light, in losing to the upstart Waterloo squad. However, this loss had to be taken in context, as Queen's was missing three of their most experienced players, the Pettigrew brothers and wee Kevy O'Shea, who were representing Ontario at the national championships in Calgary. The rumours that these three were thinking of holding out for "Emmitt Smith" type contracts proved untrue, and overall the loss only served to harden the resolve of this already skilled squad. Both firsts and seconds went undefeated for the rest of the season with displays of skill and

Doom to Dome and Touchdown Jesus

BY FRANK DIXON
 The Queen's Journal

College football seasons both here and stateside approach their climaxes.

Blues from Doom to Dome
 Do you remember? One year ago, Queen's migrated to Sky-Dome to cheer the Gaels to the Vanier Cup, 31-0 over St. Mary's.

This year's game promises a great story. The Toronto Varsity Blues, who last December had their program cancelled by funding cutbacks, not only reincarnated, but made their first Vanier Cup since 1974. They meet the Calgary Dinosaurs tomorrow at SkyDome (TSN, 6 p.m.).

One could label Varsity's improbable odyssey "from Doom to Dome." Supporters raised $250,000 to finance the team for this season and beyond. Varsity notched a 9-1 season, avenging their only loss to Western in the OUAAs title game. The Blues rolled up a staggering 590 yards in their 26-16 Churchill Bowl conquest of OQIFC champ Concordia.

The Gaels shouldn't be surprised Varsity made it this far. On Sept. 4th, Queen's fell 42-10 to Toronto in an exhibition game at Varsity Stadium. Varsity's big-play offense in that game turned into a season Blueprint.

Calgary beat last year's Vanier finalist St. Mary's 37-23 in the Atlantic Bowl. The 7-2-1 Dinos have won three titles—1983 over Queen's, 1985, and 1988—in the last decade. In that span, nobody else won more than one.

This Calgarian is torn between cheering his hometown team and rooting for the great story a Blues' win would be. Varsity should be favoured to make the Dinosaurs extinct and send them back to Jurassic Park.

Hopefully the Vanier Cup attracts more fans than the 2,217 the Churchill Bowl drew to Sky-Dome. Maybe everyone was home watching Florida State—Notre Dame on TV. U of T has 40,000 students and 400,000 alumni within an hour's drive. Have the atrocious Argos turned the whole town off football? Varsity might be able to beat the 3-15 Argos!

TD Jesus saves Notre Dame

There was another prominent dome on Saturday's Notre Dame—Florida State "Game of the Century" telecast. The golden dome atop Notre Dame's basilica reflected the afternoon sunshine around the continent. It's no coincidence Fighting Irish players wear gold-coloured helmets.

With three seconds left and the Seminoles attempting a miracle tying touchdown, Catholic Notre Dame was perhaps saved by

"Touchdown Jesus", the huge stadium-overlooking mural of Jesus Christ with His hands uplifted in a manner similar to a referee's touchdown signal. But when giving thanks for the #1 ranking, the Fighting Irish and their fans should also commend their big offensive line, the main reason for Notre Dame's 31-24 win.

It's difficult to find an original angle on this exciting game, which surpassed its gnomous hype. However, consider this: in a game between consensus #1 and #2 teams, both quarterbacks—Charlie Ward of Florida State and Kevin McDougal of Notre Dame— are African-American. Significant, because it's common knowledge quarterback is a white position in U.S. football.

It is not because African-Americans are inherently incapable of playing the position. Right down the line, from high school to the pros, not-so-subtle institutionalized racism implies African-Americans are somehow not smart enough to handle a field general's role.

Evidence? Consider how few African-American NFL quarterbacks there are. Warren Moon (Oilers), Randall Cunningham (Eagles), Roddy Peete and Andre Ware (Lions), and Vince Evans (Raiders) are the only five African-Americans who are either starting or backing up, out of 28 teams and 56 quarterback spots.

While many Latins play pro baseball and plenty of Europeans play pro hockey, American colleges are the NFL's exclusive source of players. African-Americans figure prominently in the NFL at virtually every position except quarterback. Beginning in high school, they are directed away from quarterback by predominantly white coaches. They become running backs, receivers, defensive backs and linebackers instead.

Now consider how much media attention has been paid to the current shortage of outstanding NFL QBs. If more aspiring African-American quarterbacks, starting in high school, could compete fairly on merit, the shortage would disappear.

White coaches at Florida State and Notre Dame gave African-American athletes chances to excel at football's most prestigious position. That's progress. Ward, with only two interceptions in ten games, is the odds-on choice for the Heisman Trophy, given to the NCAA's top player, while McDougal leads the #1 Irish.

Gaels dump Cornell

Where is Ithaca on the map anyway?

BY T. CASEY
The Queen's Journal

This past weekend the women's hockey team spent nine hours on a bus to play a three hour game against Cornell University. It was certainly worth the long trip as Queen's defeated the Ivy League school by a score of 5-3.

Queen's opened the scoring as Tanya Casey passed the puck to Julie Walker on the point. Walker's slapshot easily found the top right corner of the net.

The Gaels soon capitalized again due to the intense forechecking of Lisa Scott. This resulted in a turnover deep in Cornell's defensive zone and allowed Simone Wilson to score a short-handed goal. However, poor defensive play and the lack of accurate break-out passes gave Cornell the opportunity to capitalize on three scoring chances. Consequently, at the end of the second period Queen's was trailing 3-2.

The Gaels came out for the last period determined to win. Their game improved considerably as they moved the puck swiftly with good stick to stick passes. The tying goal came as a result of a passing play between Casey and Stacey Harvey. Once the Cornell goalie was out of position, Casey was able to hit the net from a sharp angle.

Queen's continued to dominate as Sarah Hurst received a pass from Casey and beat the netminder on the short side. Casey then finished the scoring for Queen's as she deflected in a shot from Hurst with Wendy Eley assisting.

Queen's began this busy weekend with two home games. The Gaels lost 5-2 to the Toronto Aeros, an Ontario select team. Queen's also played the Concordia Stingers. The Gaels played an excellent game up until the third period when four unanswered goals resulted in a 6-2 loss.

The second goal was scored from a shot by Casey in the slot with Hurst and Hurst assisting.

These exhibition games represented three strong games for Queen's against excellent opponents. Tonight and tomorrow the Gaels resumed league play as they travel to Guelph for back-to-back games versus the lowly Gryphons.

Athletes of the Week

This week, The Journal honours two soccer players who have been appointed first team All-Canadians by the CIAU. Martha Hall, a forward on the women's soccer team, received this honour. A third year PHE student from Oakville, Martha was recognized for her consistent play and strong effort throughout the season.

As well, Marc Labrom, the captain of the men's team, also was appointed M.V.P. of the OUAA East Division. According to coach John Walkerk, Labrom was "the most outstanding player throughout the season." He was also selected OUAA All Star.

squeaked past the heavily favoured and extremely talented Moose team in the finals. A lot of time was had by all with thanks to super ref Mike Richards and convenor Lucie Forstner. There are three remaining spots for BEWIC SPORTS. This event is the most fun and 27 of your closest friends could possibly have while fully clothed so ante up $252 smackeroonies ($9 per person) at the PEC and prepare to enjoy!

With barely enough time to run home and grab some lunch (or play some pool), the Gaels were back in the water for a match against their long time rivals, the Carleton Ravens. The capacity crowd was treated to a hard fought, see saw battle which ended with a 7-6 victory for Carleton. BROOMBALL
The finest exhibition of broomball skill (or the most amount of broomball luck) was demonstrated by the following teams in our 1993 BSD event (just a little Phys Ed dominance here!).

A Champs - MCKOCK JOCKOS

- A Finalists - QUEEN'S JOCKS
- B Champs - SUPER JOCKS
- B Finalists - STRANGE BREW
- C Champs - STILL HERE!
- C Finalists - CHEM GEEKS

Broomball, as a game, basically consists of putting a small orange ball into the opponent's net while using only a chopped off broom as a stick. Sound easy? Factor in the fact that there is another team, complete with a goaltender attempting to prevent you from doing this. Still no problem? How about if you are on ice so that every player has absolutely no traction whatsoever and an annoying tendency to slide solid objects (ie. boards, netting, players etc.).

Broomball is a GREAT game. It's easy to catch on to and a fun, fun game. There's nothing like an unannounced tumble on the ice to bring even those with the loftiest expectations.

Four All-Canadians

Climie CFL East Division All-Star

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

In the past week, four Golden Gaels, have won selection as CIAU All-Canadians. In addition, Queen's Law student Jock Climie, a slotback for the CFL's Ottawa Rough Riders, was picked for the East Division All-Star team.

Women's head soccer coach Dave McDowell won the CIAU Coach-of-the-Year award. It is the first time a Queen's women's soccer coach has won this honour. Last year, men's head coach John Walker Sr. won, so it's now back to back. McDowell is in his sixth year as head coach of the team. In 1988, his first season, McDowell led Queen's to the CIAU title in women's soccer's first year as a CIAU sport. This year, the Gaels were nationally ranked for much of the season before suffering an upset loss at the OWIAA championships.

Queen's forward Martha Hall was chosen to the CIAU All-Canadian team. She joins an impressive list of Gaels, including Vicki Lowes and Cathy Redshaw, who have made it in past seasons. From the men's soccer Gaels, captain, defender and Journal correspondent Marc Labrom was selected to the CIAU All-Canadian squad. The men's team capped an incredible season by winning the OUAA championship for the first time since 1975. An 11 game unbeaten streak was keyed by the team's outstanding defensive play, where Labrom played an important role. The Gaels surprised many by making it all the way to the bronze medal game at the CIAU's.

Mark Robinson, offensive lineman from Queen's football Gaels, made the CIAU All-Canadian 2nd team. Robinson was also the OCAA nominee for the Russ Jackson Award, a national honour given to the CIAU football player who combines athletics, academics and citizenship. Unfortunately, Robinson did not win. As St. Mary's quarterback David Sykes captured this award, it is doubly worthy, it doesn't make a lot of sense to give an award of this sort to the same person year after year.

Climie, a fourth-year professional who attended Queen's Law school during the winter term, played football in the summer and fall, possessing best numbers of his career. He scored 11 touchdowns to lead Ottawa, caught passes for more than 1,000 yards, and was his team's nominee for league's Outstanding Canadian player.

Women's waterpolo in tough

BY WALLY POLOUGH
The Queen's Journal

The Golden Gaels women's waterpolo team hosted the year's first league tournament this past weekend. After some frustrating pre-season losses, the young Gaels team was ready to start the year off right.

The first game pitted Queen's against a powerful U of T squad. With the addition of ex-Gael captain Martha Wyatt, the Blues presented a tough opener for the team. After floundering around while Toronto leapt to a 6-0 lead by the end of the first half, the wake up call arrived and the Gaels realized that maybe they could keep pace with the not so almighty U of T Blues. With JoJo Hindle scoring two, and Mitch McDonough and Shelly "I don't have to breathe to play" Reid adding one each, the Gaels pulled the score within two. The Blues stood their ground though and sealed the game with two late goals, winning 8-4.

With barely enough time to run home and grab some lunch (or play some pool), the Gaels were back in the water for a match against their long time rivals, the Carleton Ravens. The capacity crowd was treated to a hard fought, see saw battle which ended with a 7-6 victory for Carleton. Jen "I won't stop until I drop" McCrea led the Gaels with four very impressive goals, with Sally Reid and Hindle both adding singles. Stellar goaltending by Shoeshine U. Makemehappy and super defense kept Queen's in the game until the final whistle.

Saturday evening saw the Gaels second team in action for the first time this year. Hosting York University and Carleton's seconds team, Queen's had their hands full playing back to back games. The Gaels defeated York in their first game of the night, finishing up with a 9-5 win. However, the lack of rest showed in their second match as they lost to the Ravens 9-2.

Sunday morning saw the Gaels second team back at it bright and early. A total team effort, and a good night's sleep, brought the team back from a fourth quarter deficit of 4-1, to win 8-5.

The Queen's firsts then had their first match of the day, facing the big Mac Attack from Hamilton. Waiting until the third quarter to finally wipe the sleep from their eyes, veterans Reid, Hindle, and the Machine McCrea each scored two to lead the Gaels to a pretty unimpressive 8-5 win.

The final game of the Gaels' weekend pitted Queen's against the Brock Badgers. Hoping to improve on the previous game's lacklustre performance, the Gaels took to the water with reckless abandon. Shooting and scoring from everywhere, Queen's turned out a 14-1 victory. Reid and McCrea each scored three, while P.H. (that's for you Jen) Hindle tallied four. Rounding out the score for the Gaels were Sinker Patrick, Rox Yong, and McDonough each with one. Racy Dear also scored her first ever Golden Gael goal.

Overall, the weekend was a huge success. Queen's young Gaels now realize that they can play with any of the league's teams and are now looking forward to their next tourney in early January. The Gaels also want to thank all the fans who showed up to root them on (though "Hoof'em" is not exactly constructive cheering, the fans were greatly appreciated). The weekend was summed up perfectly by Captain McCrea, "It's early.... It's Sunday...."

Foiled again

BY STEVE COBHAM
The Queen's Journal

Last weekend, the Queen's varsity fencing team travelled to Brock University for its annual competition. The event was very well attended with a total of 246 competitors travelling from Ontario and the United States.

On the first day, three competitions in men's foil, sabre and women's epee were held. In men's foil, Alan Chung from Queen's placed third out of a field of 61 competitors, while Scott Wright finished in sixth place.

In sabre, Queen's best result was produced by rookie Kenvi Santososso, who surpassed all previous efforts and surprised himself by placing eight out of 54 entrants. Team regulars Steve Symong and Sarah Woodrow finished thirteenth and fourteenth respectively.

In women's epee, Amy Olson fought through a tough crowd to place third overall. It was the stiffest women's epee competition of the university circuit so far this year.

In women's foil, Silvia Pascual finished ninth, rookie Allison Bain demonstrated a fierce competitiveness to finish eleventh, and Sue Myong was fourteenth out of a field of nearly forty entrants. In men's epee, Kevin Armstrong finished fifth out of forty-nine and Dave Williamson was eighth.

The competition was the largest of the university competitions so far and the last of this term. The team will now practice until the Christmas break before meeting again in January to travel to Western, and begin preparing for the OUAA and OWIAA championships.

Rucking to domination

determination that even won praise from that lighthouse of rugby knowledge, Ian Simpleton.

Indeed, many observers noted that the only team to consistently outperform Queen's first team was their own second team. The seconds were a young and talented squad, led by the unwavering dedication of veteran stalwarts Tricky Dicky and Jonny Centre. When the season ended, both the first and second teams stood at the top of the tables. The scene was set for a return to past glories.

After handily dispatching of a gutsy Carleton squad, Queen's had only one hurdle left to clear in their quest for redemption. But what a task it would prove to be.

November 6 brought with it not only cold weather, but a surprisingly uncompromising Western squad. The game started well for the home side with a spectacular early try. Fly-half Stephen Pettigrew collected his own towering up-and-under and ghosted his way to the line, much to the delight of his mom and his dog. The try went unconverted and things started to go badly for the heavily favoured Gaels.

The referee Hank Happy whistle seemed intent on pinning Queen's down in their own end, providing Western with an unending stream of chip shot penalties. The Western kicker managed to scrape three penalties over the bar. Stephen Pettigrew, who took over the kicking duties from his brother Gareth, notched a penalty near the end of the half to make the half-time score 9-8, for Western!

Things continued to go badly for Queen's when, immediately after half, Western were awarded another gift penalty to take a 12-8 lead. Fate seemed to be firmly against Queen's as they continued to make uncharacteristic mistakes.

However, the momentum changed midway through the second frame when Queen's veteran core picked up the slack. The "TSN turning point" came when captain Gareth "the Pit" Pettigrew hit a monstrous penalty from 55 metres out, reducing the lead to a mere one point.

Pool days are here again

BY NATATION
 The Queen's Journal

Following a series of intimidating practices in early September, the Queen's varsity swim team narrowed itself down to a 30 swimmer roster. This year Queen's swimmers will take a qualitative approach placing much emphasis on "team work".

The Gaels began their season in October travelling to Ottawa to face the Carleton and Ottawa U. teams. Competing only in relay events, swimmers were strongly urged to try some of their off events in order to support the team. Cynthia "no ligament" Eccles swam an amazing 100m breaststroke, while Ian "I go the distance" Gardner displayed his incredible stamina over a medley of events. Queen's swimmers would not be intimidated by these Ottawa teams as they exited the pool victorious.

After two more weeks of intense training this select group of fish travelled back to the nation's capital to compete at Carleton University. However, before the meet, the team decided to have a ritual "shave down", "grease-up" night on the Friday before the meet. This included relay races such as the 2X Fun All freestyle, and the 2X A&P and back. The team honoured their prairie fighting ex-captain and concluded with some mental preparation and visualization in the Hangar. The team was officially ready to compete.

Swimming slightly dehydrated from the long bus ride, the Gaels managed to once again demolish Ottawa's finest. However, it did appear as though there was less air under water than above as swimmers seemed to surface quite quickly off their turns (breast-strokes excluded). Cindy "plateau" Housley conquered her fear of one hand touches and false starts, proving she is a definite asset to the team. Aaron "deep throat" Hoegge survived many gruelling events that she swam, an empty stomach, way to go D.T.! Overall, it was an excellent display of team work that pulled the team to yet another victory. Following the meet, the Ottawa teams displayed their knowledge in organization and energy conservation at a 2 hour pasta dinner.

Finally, with the home pool advantage and supporting fans on homecoming weekend, Queen's swimmers would shine for a third time. Competing in distance events only, there was a sense of strength and desire to win amongst the team. Proving to be intimidated, the Ottawa U. team failed to bring a women's relay team leaving the Gaels with a 1-2 finish. One Queen's swimmer in particular showed courage, team work, and determination upon his arrival he was subtly informed that he would be competing in the 200m butterfly for the first time. Colin "moral dilemma" Thornley completed this event only to climb back on the blocks to race a 200m breaststroke. The Queen's female breaststroke proved to dominate the Ottawa team with a 1-2-3 finish "ungowa", while the flyers entered their way through the water touching in a similar fashion. Coach Agar feels that "This is one of the best teams Queen's has ever given their hands on. They're a smart bunch of kids and they know what it takes to win."

The Queen's swim team will be travelling to York, Waterloo, and Guelph this weekend to watch for results in The Journal.

Disappointed in Montreal

BY FRANK DIXON
 The Queen's Journal

The fates were not kind to the Queen's women's basketball Gaels last weekend at the Concordia Invitational. This very strong event had four of the eight finalists from last year's CIAU championships, precisely the level of opposition the Gaels need most to face if they are to improve.

But the Gaels were not equal to the challenge. In the first game, against host Concordia, Queen's fell behind 35-22 at halftime and ultimately lost badly, 74-50. With six minutes to go, the Gaels were within 11 points but then collapsed against a much improved Stingers team. Vicki Wilson led Queen's with 16 points and Tanya McIntyre had 11. Concordia's balanced attack was paced by Tricia Demers and Linda Benjamin, each with 14.

Moving to the consolation side, the Gaels met Brock in a competitive game which went right down to the buzzer. Queen's had a 71-70 lead entering the final minute, but Brock hit a field goal with 34 seconds to go. The Gaels couldn't score on their next possession, as Brock nailed two free throws with three seconds left to seal their win. Jenny Laughton led Queen's with 18 points, and Vicki Wilson had 14. Steacy Robinson was a terror for Brock with 29 points.

Head coach Dave Wilson was disappointed to lose to Brock, which earlier this year lost to Waterloo, a team the Gaels destroyed by 36 points. "We're just not playing well at all right now," Wilson said. "We seem to be getting bogged down mentally, and not doing to do a little too much. We have more talent than we're showing, but we've got to stop getting flustered, be more patient, and just play within our capabilities." The Gaels started to get back on track in their final game against St. Mary's. Leading just 42-38 at halftime, Queen's got going on all cylinders in the second half, pulling away to win 86-58. Vicki Wilson scored a game-high 23. Laughton had 20, and Stephanie Jamieson came off the bench to hoop 12 points in a perfect 6-for-6 shooting.

Sports Trivia

- Q: Has a Pat Burns ever won a Stanley Cup?
 A: No. The closest Burns ever came was in 1988-89 when the Canadiens lost to Calgary in six games. Keep an eye out this year for Burns to avenge this defeat.
- Q: What's the longest rush from scrimmage in NFL history?
 A: The longest run is 99 yards by Tony Dorsett for the Dallas Cowboys against Minnesota in 1983.
- Q: What Division I NCAA college football team has the highest winning percentage of all time? Michigan, Michigan St., Notre Dame, USC or Florida State?
 A: Going into this season, although Michigan has the most victories of all time with 722, Notre Dame has the highest winning percentage with .759 (702 victories).
- Q: What Division I NCAA college football team has the longest winning streak, and how long was the streak?
 A: The number of wins is 47 in a row by Oklahoma from 1953-57. Interestingly, this was ended by the Fighting Irish in a 7-6 game.
- Q: Who has the longest interception return in CIAU football history?
 A: Tom Europe of Bishop's ran one but for 111 yards last year in a game against Queen's.
- Q: What prize fighter has the most career knockouts?
 A: Archie Moore, active from 1946-1960, does with an incredible 130 KOs.

Skydiggers
 A.J.'s Hangar
 BY JHON JUNYK
 The Queen's Journal

Last Friday and Saturday the Skydiggers brought their own distinctive brand of jangly guitar rock to a packed house at A.J.'s Hangar. The band has changed drummers since the recording of their latest CD, Just Over This Mountain, and after rehearsing for most of October they have started doing selected gigs in Ontario to get some live experience with the new line-up.

The Skydiggers have been a staple of the Canadian music scene for about the past five years. With solid backgrounds in the industry the band started by playing small venues in Toronto but quickly gained national prominence with the single "I Will Give You Everything," and with a Juno for Most Promising New Act in 1992.

The "up and coming" stage of a band's career is a dangerous one and it has proven to be the kiss of death for many Canadian acts. However, this weekend the Skydiggers showed themselves to be above the pitfalls of this stage of their career by putting on a show with an impressive blend of irony, intelligence, energy, and creativity.

The band played songs from all three of their CDs - their self-titled debut, 1992's Restless, and this year's Just Over This Mountain. Their music is generally described as upbeat folk/rock, but this doesn't do justice to the diversity of their repertoire. Songs like "Swamp Boogie" sounded like a sinister version of R.E.M., "Sweet Dreams For You," was reminiscent of a Bo Diddley 45 played on 33, "Just Over This Mountain" came across like an intense, surreal rockabilly/country number.

The Skydiggers juxtapose disparate elements and make them work together: a manic jangle rock tune is followed by a nearly comatose neo-country number, a sweet melody is yoked to dark and disturbing lyrics, or a harmonic or trumpet line is added to a spare arrangement. These twists give the music a sense of the unexpected and keep it from being tiresome or cliché.

But the Skydiggers experience depends just as much on the live show as on the music itself. The first striking thing about the band is their appearance. Guitarist Josh Finlayson looks like Grizzly Adams, Peter Cash looks like something out of Bartley, and Andy Maize looks like I don't know what with his hands stuffed into his back pockets doing that bizarre chicken dance of his.

More than image though, the show works because of the band's energy, intensity, and humour. Maize is constantly entertaining - whether thrashing around stage, deadpanning "Thanks alot!" after every song, or spewing out a rambling stream of consciousness monologue during "Monday Morning."

His irony allows him to tackle serious issues without being pedantic or patronizing. So Maize was able to talk about penis implants, River Phoenix, the UNB professor's justification of date rape, and make us see how absurd the world is without getting on a soap box.

This made me think back to the Me, Mom and Morgentaler show at Allie's on October 27. While that band is exciting and musically innovative, their self-righteous approach to social issues alienates their audience and reveals the condescension with which they view their fans. On the other hand, the Skydiggers respected their fans and the crowd shot that respect back at the band - crowding the stage, dancing, and responding enthusiastically to the music and the schtick.

All in all, the main feeling I got from the Skydiggers was sincerity. In the most recent issue of The Wire Josh Finlayson is interviewed and he says:

"[The music] has to be very genuine and very honest and sometimes that comes by fluke... sometimes it just comes by hard work trying to get to that stage, but I think we kind of recognize what is sort of honest and that is... the purpose behind recording for us, but sometimes we hit it better I think than others."

They certainly hit it this weekend.

A society we don't know

Menace II Society
 Directed by Allen and Albert Hughes
 Princess Court Cinema
 BY DAVID ULLMANN
 The Queen's Journal

"Yo! Where's that phat beef jerky?" - A convenience store confrontation.

for a father figure. The candidates - his drug-dealing cousin, his convict mentor, his Bible-quoting grandfather and his friend's father - all fall short of the mark. Without anyone to guide him, Cain is guided by what he feels he needs: a fast car, a good-looking woman, gold, gold and more gold, and a gun.

This film, like so much of the New Black Cinema, is directed by young first-time directors who overachieve without overreaching. This time the directors are 20-year-old twin brothers. The commendable Hughes brothers demonstrate their special talent in this film. Despite the violence implicit in the film's message, it's not gratuitous and the characters each maintain their independence throughout the film.

Two points of criticism. First this film suffers from what I call, "Grand Canyon Syndrome." You find that as the film progresses you are continually waiting for something terrible to happen to the people you are beginning to care about. You're continually at the edge of the seat waiting to see which character will die next. This is, of course, the the characters who might have a future. Menace II Society watches Cain free-fall into anarchy.

Cain is the product of his environment. He grew up with a drug dealer for a father and a heroin addict for a mother. His father did business in the home, killed people in the home and beat his wife in the home. June Cleaver would have thrown up just looking at it.

The film takes it for granted that these beginnings determined the destiny of Cain and his friends. This group of friends includes all the other products of this surrounding. One friend is a hustler, one is a football player, one is a converted Muslim, one is a psychopath, and one is an upscale drug dealer. The fates they meet says much about the directors' dire predictions for the youth of Los Angeles.

Cain's parents came to various sordid ends so he grew up with his grandparents. The result is a quest directors' intention, but I find it stressful.

Second, the ending is kind of inevitable. If you are keeping your score card of events that should happen in a film of this type, you will know before the end what has to happen.

The role of women is always obscure in these films. In Menace II Society women are mostly show pieces. They wear tight outfits and blend into the background. The Watts district is, according to this film, a patriarchy, manifested in the male-propagated violence. There is one strongly-written and acted female main character - Ronnie, played by Jada Pinkett from A Different World - but on the whole the story of the women in this society remains untold.

Menace II Society is the best of the Boyz in the Hood genre of films so far. The action is constant, the story holds the characters together and the message is clear and important. From time to time, the film is narrated by Cain. At one point he is asked a question, "Boy, do you even care if you live or die?" In the end, he answers the question, and that answer is powerful.

Living in the wild west

The Honky Tonk Cowboys cut their musical teeth in Wild West.

Wild West
Directed by David Attwood
Princess Court Cinema
BY SARAH BURNS
The Queen's Journal

November tends to be a depressing month all around. It seems to be full of cold, grey days, mid-terms, essays and anxiety from start to finish. Well, Wild West presents an opportunity for a much-needed break from reality. Perhaps this film isn't for everyone. Those looking for intellectually stimulating entertainment will be disappointed. Wild West is definitely easy viewing, but is still wonderfully original, interesting and most of all, extremely funny.

Set in Southall, London's "little India," the film tells the story of Zaf and his two younger brothers who form a country-western band called The Honky Tonk Cowboys. Zaf, played by Naveen Andrews, is a rebel and a dreamer. He can't hold a job and he occasionally steals police cars, but you have to love his optimism. Zaf is determined to escape Southall by cutting a record which will take the Cowboys to Nashville, Tennessee.

As the film opens, Zaf's dream looks unattainable. He has just quit another job, a trio of neighbourhood thugs are out to kill him, and gigs for the Cowboys are few and far between. It appears that his mother is right when she disparagingly remarks, "There are no Pakistani cowboys." Yet Zaf does not lose faith. He keeps on dreaming. His luck appears to turn when he meets Rifat, played by Sarita

Choudhury (of Mississippi Masala and who also happens to be a Queen's grad). Zaf convinces Rifat to leave her abusive husband and front the band. From that point on, despite the racism of record producers, the Cowboys don't look back. Few people could watch Wild West without at least cracking a smile. The comical circumstances which satirize the crime and violence of Southall, and the colourful characters, like Jag, the Cowboys flamboyant manager, create hilarious scenes throughout the film.

Andrews is an appealing and gutsy Zaf, and there is a believable rapprochement between him and his two brothers. Choudhury, although possessing the beauty and the presence to convincingly turn the band around, seems to be the weak link in the film. Yet, eventually you realize that her character is not meant to be strongly stated. It is Zaf's optimism and originality, not Rifat, which holds the band together in the end.

The music is also fun and uplifting. The voice of Rebecca Price, not Choudhury, enhances the sound of the band, but Andrews does take the opportunity to show off his voice and considerable skill on the acoustic guitar.

Wild West is a simple film, without fancy camera work or heavy symbolism, yet it boasts a cast of crazy characters, incredible situations and a happy ending which will leave you entertained and smiling as you exit the theatre.

Join the Queen's Indian Students' Association tonight at the 9:05 showing of Wild West and receive a special group rate. They will be meeting first at a Grad Club social at 7:00pm from which they will proceed to the Princess Court Cinema.

The artist as a young man

"Now that I can buy beer, I know I'm no longer a child prodigy!"

BY FIONA VANCE
The Queen's Journal

How would you like to travel all over the world, doing what you love best, being admired, and knowing that your future is bright and happy? I have stopped dreaming about such foolish things, but Corey Cerovsek has managed to do more than dream - he has lived it. Now at Indiana University, studying under the renowned violin pedagogue Josef Gingold in free time between tours, Cerovsek has been performing all over the globe with illustrious orchestras and in recital. In anticipation of Cerovsek's upcoming concert on Sunday with his sister, Katja, I recently spoke with the Vancouver-born violinist by phone.

At the ripe old age of 21, Cerovsek has outgrown his image as the cute child prodigy. The intersection of music and business, he remarks, helped create this image, as Cerovsek quips, "now that I can buy beer, I know I'm no longer a child prodigy!"

With fame comes gawking people. Most humans' nervous systems would trigger alarm at being subjected to the scrutiny of thousands of expectant audience members, but Cerovsek is at home on stage: "I still have performances in situations when I get excited in a physiological sense. But I don't get nervous and in 95% of the concerts, I don't even get that flush in the body." Contrarily, though, "I can get shy in a small social group," he admits.

Cerovsek's interests and talents are not limited to music, though. A typical 16-year-old Canadian is mounting along in grade 11, but at that age Cerovsek was receiving his Bachelor's and Master's Degrees in Music and Mathematics. As a Queen's student, I will have difficulty getting a B.A. by age 23 and am awed by Cerovsek's accomplishments. When asked how on earth he'd pulled this off, he responded frankly: "Nobody told me it was supposed to be hard." Laughing, he describes hearing his friends' complain about mid-terms, "and I think, You poor suckers! I remember that!" As a 12-year-old, he claims that he was much less concerned with his social life than as a 21-year-old; but the work in those adolescent years should "not to be underestimated," he adds.

Why a mathematics degree? Being a good ArtSci "mathophobe," I nearly choked when Cerovsek said he sees math as "a crossword puzzle recreation." As for the link between mathematics and music, he sees a similarity in the construction of a good mathematical argument and a convincing musical expression, in the communication of each. Nevertheless, he admits, "I've never been on stage and found that a certain phrase reminded my of topology."

Yet mathematics doesn't influence his playing style. The phenomenal stage presence and personality of this engaging violinist come rather, "as I follow my own impulses," dealing more with emotion and aesthetics than numbers. He finds audience response important to his performance and realizes the role of appearances in concerts. "When the music isn't communicating directly, the conviction I put in convinces [the audience]."

Canada can be proud that Corey Cerovsek is Canadian, but the country can be less proud of itself. When Cerovsek was younger, the Canada Council turned him down for much-needed funding, but as soon as he became successful in the United States, Canadian support suddenly "popped out of the woodwork." Despite these mixed feelings, though, he admits to feeling "an instinctive patriotism" toward Canada.

Corey and Katja Cerovsek will be performing on Sunday at 2:30 pm at Grant Hall. The program is based on a concert they did recently in New York and includes a broad range of works from a diversity of musical periods. Corey points out that he and his sister, as performers, only have about 50% of the influence on program choice, the rest going to agents and organizers and such. He is playing, among other selections, Hungarian composer Bela Bartok's Rhapsody No. 1, Sz.86 (which he played in Budapest in March); Cerovsek notes that "the piece has a strong folk aspect and rural feel," making it "a lot of fun." Schubert's Fantasy in C Major, D 934, on the other hand, is "intellectually a real work-out" with a more cerebral aspect. A series of virtuosic pieces will end the afternoon with a flourish.

Cerovsek continues to mature as a musician, but says he always preferred to be judged "by the same standards as an adult player."

Corey and Katja Cerovsek play at Grant Hall, Sunday at 2:30pm. Tickets are available at the Performing Arts Office in the upper level of the JDUC.

Not in Hollywood

Concrete Blonde
Mexican Moon
Capitol Records
BY CHRISTIAN deBRUIJN
The Queen's Journal

"Still in Hollywood," taken from Concrete Blonde's critically acclaimed self-titled debut, still remains (for me) one of the best songs released in the 1980's. With their previous two releases - 1990's im-melodrama which comes off as sounding very pretentious. The next song, the album's title track, fares far better with its blend of soft Spanish guitar pop. But, uncharacteristically, the lyrics are very poor. I look up at the sky! I am tired! I'm thinking of you! I underneath a Mexican Moon. Come on Johnette, you can certainly do better!

Things do get slightly better, pressive Bloodletting and the disappointing Walk In London - the band has posed a question of what to possibly expect next. Would it be a return to the raw passionate style of their first two releases or to the boring and overproduced Walking In London?

Mexican Moon starts on a very disturbing note with "Jenny I Read." On this track, vocalist Johnette Napolitano wallows in however, on "Jonestown" with an opening speech delivered by Jim Jones (aka the Kool-Aid killer) and then slithering into the murky vocals of Napolitano, which at points are overdubbed on a megaphone - an effect which successfully brings forth her passion and anger against zealots and brain-washers.

To Hell With Burgundy
The Toucan
BY ANDREW McALLISTER
The Queen's Journal

On Monday November 15, Manchester's To Hell With Burgundy's folk arranged power pop was received with mixed reaction at the Toucan. A recent horde of praise has graced such periodicals as Q, Melody Maker, and the New Music Express in connection with THWB. Such exceptional press has unfortunately produced a barrage of ridiculous band comparisons, the most extreme accusing them of being Love-revivalists.

The arrangement of the group has been the centre of much interest. THWB is a three piece electro/acoustic outfit whose relentless meld with their hook-laden songs. Karl Walsh establishes the tonal centre playing acoustic guitar while Kevin Metchar largely concentrates on central melodies and fruitful counterpoints. Joanne Hensman establishes the rhythm section playing an upright homemade bass drum and snare one handed, as she frolics with a tambourine in the other.

A few words with Kevin Metchar revealed that THWB have been often confronted with an unmotivated and disinterested music industry. The initial interest by Factory Records resulted in the release of one album and two singles. But this interest soon waned and THWB found themselves abandoned with no source of distribution. The "tossed out on your ear" mentality that reverberated through the music press proved to be an exaggeration. THWB were largely unhappy with Factory and disappointed with its abysmal marketing effort.

Forgoing a conventional four piece rock-pop arrangement, (which was proving antithetical to their goals), in favour of their current status has been the source of much difficulty. THWB is a marketing oddity. The hand-handed treatment of THWB by the industry stems from them not being a "proper band." As Kevin explained, they have no front man, and their live show discards numerous studio musicians who appeared on previous records: specifically a bassist. "I don't know what a proper band is," shrugged Kevin.

None of this arrests THWB from putting on a solid show. Their sound is thick and tight, devoid of the sparsity which often plagues semi-acoustic live acts. Battling the rigors of touring and operating their own Stig Europe record label, THWB's performance was flawless. Opening with such confessions as "Telephone Song," the original percussive sounds give the songs a tribal edge. "I Can't Understand You" demonstrates the folk at the foundation of THWB with Kevin's improvisation on mandolin. The group also delved into the song-cache of their "Earthbound" album, finding "An Honest Man." (Within I found one chord change which is undoubtedly the source of the unjust Love comparison). The subject matter of their material was noteworthy: stirring notions of costly spiritual change and condemned relationships.

Although their performance was flawless and energetic, THWB failed to motivate the Kingston crowd. Frequent "are you alive there" type questions directed at the crowd of publican patrons elicited no response. A second set seemed to confirm the exasperation of the group in their efforts to over the burgeoning, but disinterested minds of British music fanatics, but in the ears of listeners To Hell With Burgundy has to be the transition from pub entertainment to solid song crafters. Their response on this side of the Atlantic, they are still not satisfied with their following at home is flatteringly aware that the music industry is still not satisfied with their response on this side of the Atlantic. With their latest album, speaker above their heads was a good thing. (their fifth domestically) The bottleneck shape of the Toucan that they initially captured with last year's infectious single, "Sit Down," which has become James' signature tune.

POLYGRAM
BY ROB BOLTON
The Queen's Journal

Getting laid back

Unfortunately, those of you looking for an album full of "Sit Down" style anthems are going to be disappointed. Right from the first track, "Out to Get You," the tone is set: sombre and slow—but passionate. Production on this album was handled by Brian Eno, who some will remember from his old band Roxy Music, but most will associate with his groundbreaking work in the development of what is now known as ambient music. The Eno influence is noticeable immediately, with underlying keyboard sounds which give the songs a dreamy quality.

The second track, "Sometimes," however, bursts out of the gates and returns us to the sound that first opened our ears to this band—it is my personal vote for Single of the Year. After just one listen, you will be endlessly singing its haunting chorus: Sometimes—when I look deep in your eyes I swear I can see your soul (trust me, you will). The song gallops along like a horse race, which is exactly the reason for the parenthetical backup title for the song—"Lester Piggott" who happens to be a famous jockey (also, the original Rough Trade single for "Sit Down" featured someone at the end of the record repeating the words "Lester Piggott"). JUNKHOUSE

Hailing from Hamilton, Junkhouse have forged a sound as solid as the heavy cauldrons that hold their hometown's economic lifeblood. Their debut album, Strays, is a garly brew of streetwise swamp boogie. Singer, lyricist and acoustic strummer Tom Wilson is backed by the psycho-rockabilly trio of guitarist Dan Achen, bassist Russ Wilson and drummer Ray Farrugia.

Long a staple of the independent music scene, Junkhouse have shared the stage with such musical luminaries as Bob Dylan, Midnight Oil and Daniel Lanois. Their live shows have become the stuff of legend along Toronto Queen Street strip.

The Waltons Stages
BY JACOB LEVIN
The Queen's Journal

Five minutes before The Waltons came on stage, the approximately 60 youths at the concert crowded the area in front of the stage in anticipation of their inevitable appearance. One would have expected a bigger turnout for the band who so successfully opened for the Skydiggers back in frosh week, but a surprisingly small crowd showed up to see their return.

Like the concert during frosh week, this show started with a short cutesie pre-recorded song that sounded like the theme to an Eighties cartoon. Then they appeared. The lead singer was one of the best parts of the show. He was up and got right into the music, leaving the audience, and, to a certain extent, the rest of the band, to be entertained by their witty conversation. The band barely pull their punches when mocking the Kiss cover band that is going to play at Stages.

"The Naked Rain" kept the exciting pace of "You and Me" and "For the first six songs, however, the not so die-hard Waltons were entertained by their witty stage conversation. The band barely pull their punches when mocking the Kiss cover band that is going to play at Stages.

Please see TRACTOR pg. 28

Waltons' tractor runs smoothly

The concert finally became lively and interesting, but this spirit was damped with "Truth and Beauty". This song was probably the only one in the concert that I would have replaced with another. This piece did not fit in the progression of the concert, and it simply brought the audience down. Don't get me wrong, the number was well-played, but it didn't make sense to put a slow song right after the band had finally got the audience to start dancing. Nobody even slow danced to it!

Fortunately they played a faster song after the downer, and then another upbeat song after that. However, it wasn't until they performed "Don't Let it Slide," that the crowd started to really get into the concert. After that, The Waltons were very successful in keeping their momentum up. The crowd started growing after the song "Jobs/Mean." The last three songs led to the climax of the night, "Colder than You." This song was announced and the crowd really did get excited. During their finale they added what they referred to as a "hip-hop, rap kind of drum beat." This was a nice touch which caused the energy and the laughter to rise in the audience.

After the first set ended with "Colder than You," the crowd, as usual, demanded an encore. Reappearing with beige blazers, they proceeded to play a song that was about "a man and his one hundred knicker-spaniels." This number seemed to be very heavily influenced by Moxxy Fruvous as it had "King of Spain" written over it. It was humorous and light-hearted, but obviously not material for their album. The last song of the evening made the audience, and even me, happy to have gone to the show.

Their masterpiece of the concert, however, was the song they played before their final song in the encore. The band played a version of Bon Jovi's hit "Living on a Prayer" that beat the original. I admit that I am not the biggest Waltons fan, but this cover song made the concert truly enjoyable for me. So if you want a well-played, and slight upbeat concert that is not obnoxious, a Waltons show is a good choice to make.

The Winter House Check Program - 1993/1994

The AMS will arrange to have a Queen's student check your home over the winter holidays, in order to reduce the likelihood of theft, and to minimize any damage resulting from a break-in.

The following is a list of services that will be performed:

- mail will be collected or slid under the door
- stamping of snow on the path to your house
- verify that newspaper delivery has been stopped
- full exterior house check
- inform the police, you, or your landlord if problems are suspected

These checks will take place every second day during the period that you have specified. The cost of this service will be $2.00 per visit.

Registration forms are available outside the AMS Office and must be submitted by December 8, 1993.

AMS IS NOW HIRING!

The Winter Holiday House Check Program is now looking for two dedicated students who will be in Kingston over the Winter Holidays to work on the Housing Patrol.

Applicants should submit their resume and a covering letter outlining reasons why they would be suitable for this position to the AMS offices (Communications Commission) by no later than 5:00pm on December 6th.

The AMS is an equal opportunity employer

Parent Resource Centre under fire

Mature Students president questions AMS priorities

BY DEANA COLLINS and KRISTEN KUNNAS
The Queen's Journal

The Parent Resource Centre has come under fire from the President of the Queen's Mature Students Association, Jack Troughton.

Troughton criticized the usefulness of the new centre, and blasted the Alma Mater Society for penny-pinching.

Since its inception in early November, the Parent Resource Centre, located in the lower John Deutsch University Centre, has attempted to facilitate the needs of parents by providing a space on campus for parents and children.

But according to Troughton, "the Parent Resource Centre is a token effort."

Todd Minerson, AMS vice-president (university affairs), disagreed.

"It's not a token gesture. It's been designed to meet the needs of parents who have spoken in open forums at AMS Assemblies," he said.

The centre was originally intended to be a place where parents could have their children supervised while they attended classes, studied or ran errands.

As such, parents must stay in the centre while their children are supervised by volunteers.

In an interview with The Journal, Troughton said he believes that there is money available in unallocated AMS surplus funds that could be used to pay for trained staff.

However, he said the AMS will not take the necessary steps because "the main emphasis in the AMS is on things that can turn a profit."

"The AMS is perfectly capable of operating good day-care, using less than one fifth of annual surplus funds," Troughton said. "Yet the surplus money is not applied to anything else — it's just re-invested and put back into surplus."

Questioning the priorities of the AMS, Troughton said, "they are more interested in making money than serving the needs of students."

Regarding funding, Minerson explained, "we're looking for alternative methods — people who hear about the existence of a surplus want to automatically spend it."

Minerson characterized investment in the Parent Resource Centre as unsafe.

He said that "what [people] don't realize about the surplus is that it should be there for a rainy day, or for when things get really bad."

"At this point there is not a lack of funds. There was no intention from the beginning for [the Parent Resource Centre] to be a drop-off centre," he said.

Because the centre operates solely on a drop-in basis, Troughton believes it is not conducive to adequate child-care or the needs of parents.

He remarked that sharp-

AMS restructuring proceeding

BY LORI THORLAKSON
The Queen's Journal

Plans for restructuring the corporate side of the Alma Mater Society are expected to proceed to the Board of Directors and AMS Assembly for approval, while the society-side recommendations are still far from complete.

The restructuring of the AMS has been underway since September, when the AMS formed two committees — the AMS Committee on Internal Corporate Structure (AMSCOICS) and the AMS Committee on Internal Society Structure (AMSCOISS) — to try to improve the efficiency of transitions within AMS services and commissions.

All recommendations for restructuring must be approved by Assembly, where a motion must pass three readings.

Services Director Jess Dutton said the AMSCOICS recommendations will also require prior approval by the Board of Directors.

However, the corporate side does not plan to wait for the society recommendations before it reports to these bodies.

"In the corporate meeting, it was decided by consensus that when we finished we would bring the recommendations to Assembly or Board, then they can decide what to do with them," Dutton said.

Administrative Services Director Stephanie Taylor questioned this plan. "We cannot implement a restructuring of half without the whole," Taylor said.

The restructuring of the society side of the AMS — which includes five commissions and at least 30 student volunteers — is proceeding less quickly.

Todd Minerson, AMS vice-president (university affairs), said he does not expect AMSCOISS to Students lack final say on food contract

BY JANE MUNDELL
The Queen's Journal

The review and renegotiation of the campus food services contract now held by Marriott Foods is continuing without student representation on the committee making the decisions.

After the Alma Mater Society Assembly passed a motion on Oct. 28 stating "that the AMS Assembly demand that the committee to review the food services contract include at least 50 per cent students to be drawn from the AMS, GSS [Graduate Students Society], MCRC [Main Campus Residents Council] and Royce Hall Council," Katherine Philips, AMS president, wrote a letter to Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations) Tom Williams addressing these concerns.

In his response to Philips's letter, Williams suggested that "two advisory committees would need to be set up: one to deal with the Board Plan in residences and a second to deal with cash sales in locations such as Mac-Corty."

The first group would include students from both the MCRC and the Royce Hall Council, while the latter would be made up of members of the John Deutsch University Centre Food Committee and employee group representatives.

These groups will be asked for advice on what the criteria for the contract bids should be, and will hear presentations from prospective bidders before ranking the bids.

However, while this leaves students acting in an advisory capacity to the food services contract, it leaves them without any say in the final decision.

When asked how he felt about this student consultation group, MCRC Vice-President Blair Bertrand replied, "it's not what we asked for, but the issue is too important [for us] not to cooperate at all. The process would proceed without us."

"I'm disappointed, but I won't be obstructionist," he said.

Philips said the administration is insisting that students should not be on the committee making the final decision, because the contract negotiation is a financial matter.

"Tom Williams doesn't think students will look beyond their stomachs to see the financial situation of the university," she said.

"If the committee makes a recommendation, why not bring it back to the students for endorsement? They will have to justify their decision anyway, so they might as well make the committees effective," Philips said.

Bertrand said the "student consultation group will meet with the committee next week."

This group, comprised of Bertrand, four members of the MCRC Dining Committee, and four students from west campus, will be telling the committee what the goals and objectives of the students will be regarding the contract renegotiation.

The decision-making committee will then put together a proposal for tendering a document to be released in January after approval and review from the student consultation group, Bertrand said.

Philips encouraged students to write to the office of VP Williams with their experiences of the campus food services and what they feel is important in reviewing the new contract.

Getting to know your trash

"We're still throwing away too many recyclables"

CUSEN picks through the trash.

Morika Glickman

Douglas and Leonard garbage was recyclable fine paper.

"It seems that when students get stressed studying we just stop thinking about recycling. We need to start working a little harder to recycle even during busy times," Bertels suggested.

She further emphasized that "the library administration needs to face the reality that students do bring food with them to study, and they should provide recycling bins for cans and bottles.

"The results we found in Mac-Corry are more worrying because multiple item recycling facilities do exist there," explained Bertels. She observed that a great deal of card-

BY BRETT HOUSE
The Queen's Journal

On Wednesday, members of the Canadian Unified Students' Environmental Network (CUSEN) completed a waste stream audit of bins left in garbage receptacles on campus — and found some surprising results.

A waste stream audit involves collecting a sample of objects left in bins around campus, dissecting them, and sorting them by their suitability for recycling or other treatment.

CUSEN members, with the cooperation of the Office of the Vice-Principal (Operations/University Relations), collected garbage from Mac-Corry Hall, Douglas Library,
Ellis, Frost, Jeffery, and Earl Halls,
as well as Leonard Hall.

They then sorted their haul outside of Douglas Library, and announced questions about recycling from their information table.

A striking split was discovered in their findings. "It appears that people working and studying in Ellis, Frost and Earl halls are all doing a very good job of ensuring recyclables make it into the blue boxes," said Stephanie Bertels of CUSEN. "We found very little fine paper, and few cans or glass bottles in the garbage from these buildings."

In contrast, Bertels said, "there were a number of items in the garbage from Douglas Library, Leonard Hall and Mac-Corry that could be recycled.

"Aluminum cans and bottles accounted for almost one-third of the Douglas Library and Leonard Hall waste," noted Bertels. "I don't think people are throwing these things away out of laziness, although the amount of fine paper in the garbage is a cause for concern," she said.

Almost half of the waste in the board, glass, aluminum and fine paper was found in Mac-Corry.

"Either people are making the choice not to recycle, they don't know these items can be recycled, or they don't know that the facilities exist. Regardless of what the problem is, way more education about recycling is needed," she said.

"People need to stop complaining about poor recycling facilities.
The opportunities to recycle on campus aren't going to improve until people use what we already have," she said.

The results of the CUSEN waste stream audit will be compared with those of the campus-wide waste audit being prepared by Queen's Waste Management Co-ordinator
Rebecca Spaulding.

The aim is to identify the form that further education initiatives and new recycling facilities should take to be most effective.

"We're planning to launch a campaign to make sure people are aware of the improvements that have been made to recycling at Queen's," explained Bertels.

"Many people we spoke with didn't realize that cardboard can now be recycled on campus. I think people really want to cut down on their waste, but aren't always sure how to do it," she said.

"We're also going to share what we learn with campus environmentalists across the country in the CUSEN network, to make sure others learn from our efforts," Bertels said.

"Getting blue boxes in place is only half the battle. Every campus needs to make sure that their recycling programme is actually effective," she said.

Alcohol Awareness Week hits home

Queen's Players, mock trial bring issues to the fore

BY TANIS ROBINSON
The Queen's Journal

Beer was a hot topic last week at Queen's, as the Alma Mater Society presented the National Alcohol Awareness Week.

The event, sponsored by the AMS, was "monumental" according to Misha Hunter, the director of Educating Students on Substance Abuse and an organizer of the week.

"It was really extensive. I think it reached a lot of people," Hunter said. "I think the alcohol awareness issue has been coming more into the front, especially in the last five to 10 years.

"For the last six years it's been going on to some capacity," she added. "This year I think we did a really good job of making it known."

One of the highlights of the week was a Queen's Players production at Alfie's last Thursday.
Entitled "Single and Sexy," it was an educational play addressing isues of alcohol abuse, safe sex, sexual orientation, date rape, and sexual harassment.

Reaction to the play was very enthusiastic, said Trisha Rickwood, director of the production. "I was concerned about it being too noisy in here, not having anyone's attention at all. [But] the audience was right into it."

The play was so successful that Rickwood hopes to perform for Kingston Collegiate and Vocational Institute students.

"It hit on a lot of issues. It was [presented] in an amusing manner, it wasn't patronizing. It was done with enough comic relief to make it enjoyable but not enough to take away from the issues," said one impressed spectator.

Audience members were impressed with the play, calling it "really funny," and "not preachy," and one even said it "rocked hard."

Hunter said the script came from the University of Waterloo. "It had a big price tag on it," referring to the $430 paid for the rights to the script.

She added that most of the money came from Residence Food and Operations, Queen's Counselling, and Student Health, with the AMS contributing the rest.

Hunter is pleased because now that the AMS has the script, they can adapt and update it every year.

Another highlight of the week,
she said, was Monday's mock trial in the Lower Ceildh of the John Deutsch University Centre. Presented by Queen's Legal Aid, the event staged the trial of a student charged for disturbing the peace, after coming home drunk from Alfie's to find his car had been towed.

Judge Paul Megginson of the Criminal Court presided over the trial, said Hunter, adding that the student was found guilty and ordered to pay a $200 fine.

Hunter was satisfied since "the event drew a big crowd. "People were hanging off the railings [of the Upper Ceildh]," she said. "Everything happened the way it really happens."

A third high point of the week was a talk on illicit drugs. The Friday talk was presented by Constable Smitty de Bellefoie of the Joint Forces Drug Enforcement Squad.

Hunter was impressed when the former undercover officer pulled out of his briefcase a kilo of cocaine, hash and LSD. Once again, the Lower Ceildh was packed, she said, adding that the question and answer period was informative.

"The idea is just to get the message out. This is also a forum for people who think they have a drug problem, or their friend might," she said.

Wallack's Art Supplies donated a $100 gift certificate for the person who designed the logo for the week. The motto "Looking at Alcohol in a Different Light" had to be included in the design. Fifth-year fine arts student Mandy Garland won the prize.

With winter underway, many students are fondly looking ahead to the holidays. For those seeking the festive spirit, the Engineering Society will be presents its annual carol service in Grant Hall, an event with over 45 years of tradition. On Nov.
28, seasonal carols will be brought to life by a brass ensemble and enthusiastic audience participation, as well as a spectacular 30-foot decorated tree. In addition to carolling, a children's party will be held in the afternoon, with singing, games, and snacks. The children's party will be held from 2-3 p.m., and two carol services will take place: 7-8 p.m. and 9-10 p.m. in Grant Hall. Although these events are free, EngSoc asks you to bring canned food donations.

Queen's Medical Outreach is initiating its T-shirt and pillow
"blitz." The event is coming up

Some eco-facts to ponder, courtesy of the Ontario Public Interest Research Group's Greenspace Committee:

- Ontario's per capita consumption of transportation fuel is nearly double that of West Germany, and more than double the United Kingdom's.
- One consequence of our reliance on the automobile is the improper disposal of motor oil. In 1990, 36 million litres of used motor oil were improperly disposed of.
- According to Environment Canada, with nearly 12 million cars on the road, Canada has one of the highest car ownership ratios in the world.
- Cars require considerable infrastructure. In some Canadian cities, up to 42 per cent of the land in the downtown core is devoted to roads, bridges, parking lots, and such infrastructure.
- Old cars wreck havoc. According to a recent study by Environment Canada, it is quite likely that 50 per cent of all automobile emissions are produced by just 10 per cent of all automobiles. Often simple repair work, such as carburetor adjustment or replacing air filters and spark plugs, will be all that's required.

Intercultural centre proposed

BY MICHAEL MOSS
The Queen's Journal

Wednesday night's Anti-Racism Steering Committee open forum was the sight of unexpected charity.

Shahabadeen Karim, architect of the Proposal for Vision 2000 — Queen's Intercultural Centre — personally donated $1,000 to the development of a study of the racial climate in the history department at Queen's.

Among the projects included in the Vision 2000 proposal are a library and classes on racial awareness subjects.

If Karim's proposal becomes a reality, it would become the first intercultural centre of its kind in Canada.

Karim studied U.S. models because "unlike Canada, U.S. colleges and universities have initiated pro-active strategies to eliminate racial intolerance and institutional racism," he said.

The steering committee was awarded $9,000 by the Ministry of Citizenship to fight racism at Queen's. In receiving the $9,000, the committee was required to spend it all within a year. Two forums similar to Wednesday's were held last year, with the express purpose of deciding exactly what to do with the money.

The committee resolved to choose one of two alternatives. The funds would either be put to immediately creating a "safe space," or invested in a research project to determine the feasibility of an intercultural centre. The safe space would be an area designated for exclusive use by a racial group.

However, committee member Lisa Jebodhsingh said that such an initiative would not be conducive to eliminating racism.

The intercultural centre was considered a higher priority, because its long-term goal would be pro-active.

"Vision 2000 aims to promote an environment supportive of diversity and cultural pluralism, [and] to provide a central meeting and social place at Queen's," stated Karim.

The Steering Committee, composed of faculty, students, staff, and community members, is careful to emphasize its estrangement from the Alma Mater Society.

"We don't want to be seen as an AMS committee especially in light of what's been happening recently in the AMS," said Jebodhsingh.

The question raised at Wednesday night's forum was, Jebodhsingh said, "where do we go from here?"

Karim said, "the proposal [for the intercultural centre] is very simple."

But Jebodhsingh said, "money is the biggest concern we have now."

Illiteracy is a problem touching every community, and afflicting millions of Canadians. One group on campus, however, is attempting to combat this problem locally, through two diverse yet vital programs.

Although only in its first year of operation, Queen's Students For Literacy is a volunteer group that has been enthusiastically received.

"We've had an overwhelming response to both programmes," said Alex Cole-Hamilton of QSFL, who estimates the number of volunteers participating in the programmes at around fifty-five.

After an interview and an intensive nineteen-hour training session, volunteers are sent into the community to tackle the literacy problems of two very different groups — children and prison inmates.

Cole-Hamilton explained that the two groups were specifically targeted, to fill the gap left by other literacy programs in the community. "There were already adult literacy programs in place but not many directed at children," she said, "and while the literacy program has been running in the past, it relied on funding from the regions Canada."

Cole-Hamilton said, "[when] the funds were cut, we picked it up," and added that QSFL's objective is "to locally meet the needs of the Kingston community."

The QSFL programs currently extend to four prisons and two primary schools in the Kingston area.

At the prisons — including Kingston Penitentiary, Collins Bay, and Prison for Women, and Minto House — volunteers are matched with inmates. Tutors provide weekly one-on-one tutoring, to assist with reading and writing skills.

At Robert Meek and Central primary schools, a drop-in programme is in place with several Queen's "volunteers" participating. Cole-Hamilton said, "the first half-hour is spent with the buddy and child working one-on-one, and this is followed by a group session."

Cole-Hamilton told The Journal that QSFL is part of a national literacy program in which 12 other universities are participating.

The initiative is supported by Frontier College, a non-profit literacy organization which has developed and sponsored literacy programs across the country for several decades.

"Generally volunteers commit to about three hours a week," said Cole-Hamilton, adding that many are enjoying the experience.

Anyone interested in getting involved with QSFL's programmes should contact 544-1441 for further details.

Speaker addresses plight of AVRO Arrow jets

BY JONATHAN ROWLEY
The Queen's Journal

According to an aviation expert, the plight of the AVRO Arrow, a Canadian supersonic jet fighter, can be compared to the current debate over the purchase of helicopters.

On Wednesday evening, QCASI Queen's Canadian Aeronautical Space Institute) organized a presentation which covered the development of Canadian fighter aviation before the second World War brought to the late 1950s.

Ron Page, an engineer and aviation expert who has been actively involved in key Canadian technological developments — including the Arrow engine and the fuel bundle for the CANDU Nuclear Reactor — made the presentation before a crowd of over 130 people.

Page described the Arrow as "very advanced for its time."

Boasting unprecedented thrust and speed, the delta wing, and being "the first fighter to bury its weapons in the fuselage," Arrow became the most advanced fighter in the western world, he said.

According to Page, "it was the first plane to fly by wire," a term given to the on-board computer which actively participates and compensates the fighter's in-flight manoeuvres.

Only six Arrows were ever produced before the Tory government, under Diefenbaker, cancelled the entire project.

Page said "everyone working on the plane was immediately fired" and "orders were given to destroy everything: drawings, materials, as well as the planes themselves."

Page and others managed to walk out with information and material on the Arrow, which Page later compiled in his book on the Arrow.

Despite a keen interest from the crowd as to why the government cancelled the Arrow, Page declined to comment on the ubiquitous political or Canada-U.S. diplomacy theories surrounding the affair.

All he would say was that throughout the Arrow's development, "the U.S. gave terrific information and assistance."

When pressed by one person in the audience, Page attributed the cancellation to economic reasons. He said the situation is similar to the current affair surrounding the Canadian purchase of billion dollar helicopters, where costs were too high to justify production.

Page said, "the weapons system killed the Arrow." He described how Canada lacked the infrastructure to develop these highly technological systems cost-effectively.

Wanting to be entirely Canadian made, the project managers from the Royal Canadian Forces would not approach other nations for this technology.

Interestingly enough, Page said, the heaviest costs had already been incurred in the plane's development, and any additional costs would have been no more than the expense required to retool and update the existing Canadian fighters — which Canada is obligated by NATO [the North Atlantic Treaty Organization] to produce.

Just like with the Arrow, Page believes the savings resulting from the helicopters' cancellation will not be quite so astronomical, once the dated existing helicopters are modified and updated.

As for the Arrow, Page said, "no one knows who issued the actual order for its cancellation," but it represented one of the few times in Canadian history we single-handedly designed, developed, and built the most advanced piece of engineering in the Western world.

issue recommendations before the holidays.

Minerson attributed the delay to the complex nature of the society.

"It's obviously a more difficult process," he said.

The committee is currently seeking feedback from the AMS commissions, volunteers, and the community groups that currently work with these commissions.

During its restructuring, the society side has attempted to maintain continuous feedback, Minerson said. He explained that this communication is aimed at preventing rumours about restructuring plans.

"A high turnover requires a highly organized structure," he said.

AMSCOISS has discussed the idea of including a permanent staff member as an ex-officio member of council, Minerson said, but no decision has been reached yet.

The idea was suggested by a permanent staff member who said the staff possess a vast knowledge of the workings of the AMS, Minerson said.

He argued that this would result in a shift of power away from students and toward full-time staff in the AMS. "I don't think it changes the fact that three students were elected to run the AMS," he said.

Tapping into the knowledge of permanent staff members is not changing the structure of the AMS, he added.

Parent centre

omered furniture and restrictive hours of operation are problematic to the centre's function.

Minerson said that "everything has been through donations, so we can't help that."

Another issue Troughton raised was the display of inappropriate posters covering the centre's walls, including safe sex posters. Troughton said that having posters cover the centre is indicative of a "children-should-not-be-seen" attitude.

Minerson said he had personally removed the questionable posters earlier this week.

The future of the Parent Resource Centre remains uncertain. Minerson explained that "the current agreement lasts until next year, but [it] depends on the JDUC decision-making committee."

Although Minerson hopes that the centre will continue its operation, he said, "there is nothing [planned] to my knowledge about the future of the Parent Resource Centre. It's not our space location any way."

Minerson said that there is "no appropriate space in existence now" for a parent resource centre. The JDUC location is provided free only for this year, he said.

Troughton commended the efforts of the centre's volunteers, yet said he feels that "too much time has gone by already. The future of the centre will depend on future AMS executives and restructuring."

"In politics, perception is reality," said Troughton. "If [the AMS] is not in virtue of what they do, they aren't in virtue of what they are. Queen's is not changing to suit the needs of a diverse university population."

Biology lab instructors face extinction

Department says quality of education won't suffer

BY PAUL ZIMBALATTI AND THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL STAFF
The Queen's Journal

One biology lab instructor is concerned about the future of undergraduate biology students, as the contracts of lab instructors terminate at the end of this academic year.

Last spring, the biology department gave all four biology lab instructors 16-month notice that their contracts would be terminated.

Rob Snetsinger, a lab instructor affected by the decision, expressed concern "that the quality of education of the biology 101 students will decrease" as a result.

"I don't see how [the biology department] could have someone come in and put in the same amount of hours," he said.

But according to Dr. Gerald Morris, the head of the biology department, the "purpose of the [lay-offs] is not to cut the resources that go to undergraduate studies," but to improve the quality of education.

"I sincerely hope and expect that it will produce an increased [quality of education], not in any way to denigrate the jobs done by the lab instructors," he said.

He explained that with the resources freed up by the release of the lab instructors, the biology department could hire additional faculty and provide increased resources for undergraduate teaching.

Chris Kuhnert, co-chair of the biology Departmental Student Council said that the decision was definitely based on resource-allocation considerations.

"Right now the issue is how much for the buck the department is getting for lab instructors," he said.

Snetsinger told The Journal he's not sure who will be replacing the lab instructors.

"Nothing has been settled at all," he said. "We have been given termination notice, but what happens next is completely up in the air."

Snetsinger said that department has three alternative for replacing lab instructors: professors, post-doctoral students and graduate students.

Morris agreed that these would be the likely replacements for the lab instructors, but added the possibility of one-year term appointments taking on the roles.

However, Snetsinger suggested that none of the three groups would be able to put in sufficient time to perform their duties adequately.

Because of the higher salary requirements of professors, he said, the department would not be able to hire the same number of people, causing the time dedicated to each lab to drop.

The AMS Hidden Hunger Committee canvassed the student housing area for its first ever holiday food drive Wednesday night. Queen's students brought in about 1,500 food items to the Partners in Mission Food Bank.

Derek Varley

"As well, professors have to put time aside for research," he added.

DSC Co-chair Kuhnert stated Snetsinger's worries. "It is certainly a concern to the DSC," he said.

However, Morris told The Journal that the biology department is "not going to have fewer people teaching the students," and cited the advantage to professors replacing lab instructors in the labs.

The advantage is that you have faculty much more involved with the preparation of labs," he said, adding that this would alleviate the separation of the lecture and laboratory components of the biology program.

Snetsinger said that he is also concerned that post-doctoral students would not be able to devote sufficient time to their labs.

The final option, graduate students, would not be able to provide the year-to-year continuity which is necessary, said Snetsinger.

He also feels that the amount of hours graduate students would have to dedicate to the job would be excessive.

"Over the years, I've put in hours and hours of overtime. I've never been paid for," Snetsinger said.

For the average grad student, he added, this extra time would be much tougher to provide, as it would detract from their own studies. "In a sense, that's exploitation," he said.

Snetsinger argued that the department could be using this opportunity to improve their commitment to education, while actually slashing the budget and cutting staff.

"It looks like they're improving education in biology 101 if they fire lab instructors and hire pros," he explained, because the professor-to-student ratio would rise, but the actual staff-to-student ratio would drop.

Kuhnert downplayed the importance of the decision.

"It wouldn't be the first time the department hasn't had lab instructors," he said, pointing out that the position has only existed since 1985.

SURVEY REGARDING AMS SERVICES

The AMS staff is currently undertaking a process whereby it is examining the services it provides to the Queen's community. This survey is intended to solicit student input that will be considered in the AMS restructuring committee's recommendations. These recommendations will be published for the Queen's community, but all individual contributions will remain confidential. Please return the survey to the AMS office reception area (lower JDUC) by Friday, December 3.

If you return a survey, you will be eligible, but not required, to fill out a ballot to vote on the following collection of prizes:

1. A gift certificate for $10 free photocopying at the P&CC (that's 15¢ copiers)
2. Five tickets to the Queen's Fall
3. A free video rental from Vids in the Hall
4. A free Tricolour Express ticket (return to one of Toronto, Ottawa, or Montreal)
5. A free Hood and Coats rental if you are a graduating student.

AMS Communications Commission - Housing Issues Committee

The Winter House Check Program - 1993/1994

The AMS will arrange to have a Queen's student check your home over the winter holidays. The following is a list of services that will be performed:

- ✓ mail will be collected or slid under the door.
- ✓ stamping of snow on the path of your house.
- ✓ verify that newspaper delivery has been stopped.
- ✓ full exterior house check.
- ✓ inform the police, you, or your landlord if problems are suspected.

These checks will take place every second day during the period that you have specified. The cost of the service will be $2.00 per visit. Registration forms are available outside the AMS office, and must be submitted by December 8, 1993.

AMS IS NOW HIRING!

The AMS Holiday House Check Program is now looking for two dedicated students, who will be in Kingston over the Winter Holidays, to work on the Housing Patrol.

Applicants should submit their resume and a covering letter outlining reasons why they would be suitable for this position to the AMS offices (Communications Commission) by no later than 5:00pm on December 7th.

MBA proposal a roll of the dice

Canadians have always taken pride in the fact that, unlike our neighbours to the south, going to university doesn't mean having to mortgage the house.

But this scenario is slowly becoming more and more of a reality for many Canadians, and has been a cause of great concern for students and parents alike.

As the federal government cuts transfer payments for education, and provincial governments flounder in abysmal indebtedness, students have been bearing more and more of the cost of post-secondary education.

As the nature of funding for post-secondary education changes, the Queen's Master of Business Administration program proposal would take these changes one step further.

The proposal seems to be the antithesis of Canadian values on education. Given this, it is not surprising that the proposal made the front page of The Globe and Mail. For, in itself, it represents a major shift in thinking about how our education should be paid for.

If the proposal is passed, the Queen's MBA program will be altered drastically. The plan would see the privatization of the program, raising tuition for MBA students to $20,000 for a twelve-month degree. The program itself would be entirely revamped.

To cover the tuition, students would reach an agreement with a financial institution to allow for an income-contingent loan repayment plan, or students would be directly subsidised by their employers. Approximately half of the students in the program would be subsidised by their employers.

The point of privatizing the program is to make Queen's a world leader in business administration in science and technology. But will the achievement of this goal have other consequences?

Will making the Queen's MBA more than just the education. They pay for the status that accompanies it. This aside, one must also look at what companies will be looking for in the future.

It may appear that in the world of corporate downsizing, management types will not be in such high demand. This, however, does not mean people are looking to graduate degrees to open doors to employment opportunities.

How does full tuition affect these people? Accessibility will definitely be constrained. As the program's students will be in a circle of high status, it seems that a circle has been created. Students look to MBA programs to increase their employment status, but employment is increasing by becoming a prerequisite for entrance into these MBA programs.

Nevertheless, given the status of fiscal federalism in Canada, the MBA proposal seems to be the way to go. Furthermore, without privatization it seems that Canadian schools would not have the chance of competing against their counterparts in the United States. Though the program may be more expensive, (to say the least) because it is concentrated into one year, it means students only need one year of employability.

As Queen's strives to compete internationally, (Herston once a part of this vision), a world class MBA program seems to fit the Queen's vision of the future.

The question that remains, however, is what precedence this sets. How will a full tuition MBA program affect accessibility to other programs? Although it seems to be a risky roll of the dice, given the demand-driven nature of the MBA program, full tuition does provide a plausible solution to funding problems. It is important, however, that such a solution not be applied to other programs - especially those that operate outside the strict realm of the marketplace and inside the realm of ideas.

program world class prevent potential Canadian business leaders from going south for their MBAs? Will companies be willing to send their employees to Queen's instead of Harvard for the same degree at virtually the same price? Success cannot be met overnight. By implementing such a program, will Queen's reach the same status immediately?

The demand for MBA programs does not seem to be on its way out. In fact, as the value of an undergraduate degree lessens, more and more people are looking to graduate degrees to open doors to employment opportunities.

Brock University
The Brock Press, Nov 4, 1993

As a university student I have often questioned whether or not education is being promoted enough in Ontario. I have often argued that to have a truly just society all we need is proper access to education. And then a letter to the editor comes in that proves you can have a university education and still be a bigot.

The authors of the letter believe that the bigotry of the people they overheard was due to a lack of information, or perhaps due to a lack of teaching grade 9 history. They are right that a lack of information in younger years can cause these attitudes. Unfortunately, they're letting everyone else off the hook.

Universities have a prime responsibility here because for many people in this white bread country, university is the first time they get to meet people from a wide variety of countries, races, and religions...Combating bigotry is about prioritizing classroom agendas, and deciding if what we learn yesterday needs to be dropped and replaced with something better. We have a special responsibility in an institution of higher learning. And I so wonder, are we living up to that responsibility?

...The only way to combat Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra is to arm students with the facts they can use to combat bigotry.

The University of Western Ontario
The Gazette, Nov 5, 1993

Jay Papernick, the chair of the Coalition of Western Jewish Students, has written a letter to Women's Issues commissioner Jenny Hewlett requesting an apology for comments author Naomi Wolf made during a speech at Western last Friday.

Papernick suggests in his letter that Hewlett "ensures that, in the future, all efforts be made to ensure the content of any speaker's remarks."

In a nutshell, he wants sponsors who bring intelligent, informed speakers to campus to censor what those speakers say.

...Whether Mr. Papernick knows it or not, and whether or not he even cares, he is requesting a student-run body to censor the very words of men and women who come to this campus to disseminate the value and the integrity of the constitutional right to free speech.

...But if Papernick feels so strongly about the comment, he needs to go to the horse's mouth and take up his complaint with Wolf, not to the people whose job it is to generate lively and informative discussion for a place of learning.

Unfortunately, most of the dialogue surrounding Show Boat has occurred at the very low level. Its biggest shame is that it has tamed elements of the Jewish and Black communities against each other, two historically oppressed cultures which should be allies in the fight for equality rather than enemies.

...While Show Boat could be considered to be a ghastly error, it certainly shouldn't be censored or stopped. At the same time democratic and peaceful dissent by its detractors has to, and should be allowed.

...It's not good enough for elected officials to slough off moral responsibility on the production company. The cheery promoters can only be blamed for poor judgment. It is the politicians, rather than their vacuous leadership who should bear the blame for directing this unfortunate wedge into our already stratified community.

Without addressing the sickness in our society that makes Walksafe necessary, we are essentially resigning ourselves to a future of Walksafe, the "institution," the "walking safe," the activity women don't want to be walking home every night. Women want to walk alone, at night; they want to walk on the mountain and through the ghetto and not be scared by their lives. Once an organization like Walksafe becomes institutionalized, it has been accepted as permanent and timeless. The thought that for the rest of our lives, women will have to be escorted down the door because men in our culture remain ignorant to the larger issues surrounding women's safety, is something which all Walksafe members, and indeed all McGill students, should consider.

More white ribbons

The Editor,

The purpose of this letter is to notify female Queen's students of an event designed by Leonard Hall to commemorate the women murdered in the Montreal Massacre on Dec. 6. The opportunity to purchase a one-foot length of white ribbon will be offered to our residents starting Nov. 29. The money raised from the purchase of this ribbon will be donated to the Kingston Interval House For Women And Children In Crisis. Interval House offers safety and support to women and children escaping abusive situations. The ribbons will be tied in the apple trees lining Leonard Field. It is our intention to remove the ribbons on the night of Dec. 6.

It has come to our attention, however, that men's efforts to protest men's violence against women have historically overshadowed the efforts of women. This is not our intention. We merely feel the need to show our support for women on this issue. If there is an objection to our proposed event, please notify us through the MCRC office. If it would be preferable, we will remove the ribbons on the night of Dec. 5 to leave Dec. 6 open for events initiated by women. We wish to show our support for women on this issue, and in no way mean to detract from or compete with any other organized activity.

If there are objections, please call the MCRC office at 545-6216. —Bernie Hurley and Barrie Hebb, Presidents of Leonard House Councils, on behalf of the Gentlemen of Leonard Hall will engineer a referendum to prevent you from writing at all. Don't get us wrong - you're allowed to be here. And we don't have anything against you as people. And we don't have any death camps or anything. But we would ask that when you are visiting our university, please try not to speak. Well OK, we'll save a column for you in The Journal but don't say anything too radical. It's bad for our virgin ears you know. And of course we did have the referendum. So that's completely fair. Now just try to play nice with the limp white bread kids.

Facing criticism from the floor at the Nov. 18 general assembly, various ASUS reps defended their anti-Surface positions, stating that they have very little choice but to vote against Surface funding by virtue of the fact that they have to respect the student vote in the referendum question - which of course doesn't consider the other 46 per cent of us chopped liver who want or need Surface to remain.

Nevertheless, Darren Littlejohn, supported by Andrew Dick, spent a good 10 minutes in excessively flamboyant oration illustrating that this type of majority mandate referendum forms the very "foundation" of the democratic process and that ASUS must "JUST SAY NO" to Surface funding.

AU CONTRAIRE! It appears as if the ASSES assembly has spent too much time attending Preston Manning appreciation banquets (No Minorities Allowed! Minorities not encouraged!) and far too little time studying our democratic processes.

Democratic governments have long recognized that there exist fundamental problems with the idea that a simple majority mandate is democratic. That is why Canadians include the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the constitution. That is why we developed the Human Rights Commission. The list goes on. Every level of government save for our ASUS has recognized that in order to become more democratic, serious effort must be made to balance majority mandates with an obligation to protect minorities. Let me spell this out - We are MUL-TI-CULL-TUR-AALLL. The AMS has given at least token recognition to this in its mission statement - "The AMS shall strive to be a non-racist, non-sexist, non-homophobic and otherwise inclusive organization."

Not surprisingly, ASUS-R-US has no such mission statement - perhaps because the ASUS guru Preston isn't fond of minorities. The fact that ASUS put a question directly affecting a minority issue to a majority mandate referendum makes its actions implicitly and systemically racist, sexist, and homophobic and, ultimately, ensures that our student services will remain far from inclusive. Think seriously about what ASUS did. And I will try to spell this out in SIMPLE(ton) language for the ASUS reps. It asked for a majority mandate on a minority issue. Oxy-moronic or just moronic? MAJORITY MANDATE REFERENDUMS ARE BY THEIR VERY NATURE MAJORITY BIASED. In effect, it engineered a minorities issue question which was by its very conception designed to fail. We will reserve labelling individual reps as Prestons until such time that we can determine whether they did this knowingly or just out of stupidity. For now we'll give them the benefit of the doubt and just label them as idiots.

PROBLEM - Not only is Arts & Science governed by a system based on the archaic notion of majority rule but, to compound problems, it is administered by the collectively stupid, although good looking. Remember that they did win that Beauty contest we call an election - yeah that's right, the one that nobody votes in because they think our system of student government is a big joke. Obviously, this issue goes far beyond the Surface issue, and calls into question the very procedures and structures of ASUS itself. Despite Littlejohn's argument that ASUS acted in truly democratic fashion, IT DID NOT! AND IT CANNOT! - at least in its present form. ASUS processes are based on the archaic concept of "simple MAJORITY rule". Sorry ASSES, but you forgot to evolve with the rest of the political system. To employ a metaphor, while con-

The Rainbow Flag

Since so many people on campus are still wearing rainbow ribbons that were distributed during Rainbow Week Nov. 1 to 7, the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Issues Committee would like to take the time to explain the history of the rainbow flag within the lesbian, gay, and bisexual community. We thank everyone who wore their ribbons in support of lesbians, gays, and bisexuals.

The following is an article that appeared in GAZE Magazine, in Minneapolis, which explains the history of the Rainbow Flag:

The Rainbow Flag

Color has long played an important role in our community's expression of pride. In Victorian England, for example, the color green was associated with homosexuality. The color purple (or, more accurately, lavender) became popularized as a symbol for pride in the late 1960s - a frequent post-Stonewall catchword for the gay community was "Purple Power." And, of course, there's the pink triangle. Although it was first used in Nazi Germany to identify gay males in concentration camps, the pink triangle only received widespread use as a gay pop icon in the early 1980s. But the most colorful of our symbols is the Rainbow Flag, and its rainbow of colors - red, orange, yellow, green, blue, and purple - represents the diversity of our community.

The first Rainbow Flag was designed in 1978 by Gilbert Baker, a San Francisco artist, who created the flag in response to a local activist's call for the need of a community symbol. (This was before the pink triangle was popularly used as a symbol of pride.) Using the five-striped "Flag of the Race" as his inspiration, Baker designed a flag with eight stripes: pink, red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. According to Baker, those colors represented respectively: sexuality, life, healing, sun, nature, art, harmony, and spirit. Baker dyed and sewed the material for the first flag himself - in the true spirit of Betsy Ross.

Baker soon approached San Francisco's Paramount Flag Company about mass producing and selling his "gay flag." Unfortunately, Baker had hand-dyed all the colors, and since the color "hot pink" was not commercially available, mass production of his eight-striped version became impossible. The flag was thus reduced to seven stripes.

In November 1978, San Francisco's gay community was stunned when the city's first openly gay supervisor, Harvey Milk, was assassinated. Wishing to demonstrate the gay community's strength and solidarity in the aftermath of this tragedy, the 1979 Pride Parade Committee decided to use Baker's flag. The committee eliminated the indigo stripe so they could divide the colors evenly along the parade route - three colors on one side of the street and three on the other. Soon the six colors were incorporated into a six-striped version that became popularized and that, today, is recognized by the International Congress of Flag Makers.

In San Francisco, the Rainbow Flag is everywhere: it can be seen hanging from apartment windows throughout the city, local bars frequently display the flag, and Rainbow Flag banners are hung from lampposts on Market Street (San Francisco's main avenue) throughout Pride Month. Visiting the city, one cannot help but feel a tremendous sense of pride at seeing this powerful symbol displayed so prominently.

Although the Rainbow Flag was initially used as a symbol of pride only in San Francisco, it has received increased visibility in recent years. Today, it is a frequent sight in a number of other cities as well - New York, West Hollywood, and Amsterdam, among others. Even in the Twin Cities, the flag seems to be gaining in popularity. Indeed, the Rainbow Flag reminds us that ours is a diverse community of which we should all be proud.

sidering the risk that you might not find the hidden meaning - you are a Hairy Ape.

Let's talk about evolving our 'wanna-be' democratic hairy ape help it find the missing link in evolution. Perhaps we need a Queen's Charter of Rights and Freedoms and a judicial body which we can judge student government actions constitutional or unconstitutional. Perhaps we need a more democratic balance of power - an ASUS Senate consisting of minority groups and special interest groups that can act as a body of sober second thought on issues that directly affect minority groups. Perhaps we need to rework referendum procedures so that nothing as lame as trying to force a minority issue through majority mandate referendum can happen again. Or perhaps we can just take the "A" and the "U" out of ASUS and call it the "SS". Or leave it as its ape-like form and shove the hairy ASUS so that it at least looks like it has evolved.

If ASUS wants to put another question to referendum it should be this: "Do you think that the ASUS constitution should be reformed to make it more democratic?" Actually, best not to do that. It's best to rock the boat - especially when you're sitting in it. Rocking boats don't always float. So for now "ASUS is Hell and is alive as well." And to paraphrase the enlightened words of Mr. Littlejohn that bastion of democracy, the pimple on ASUS who, who, squeezed, blurred out, that's really too bad for minorities.

No reconsidered

The Editor

I am writing this letter in response to the recent debate on Surface. I am a first year student who voted NO in the referendum. I now greatly regret my vote.

Voting No was just a reflexive action. I was motivated by peer pressure and propaganda. I was not informed of my decision and the ramifications of it, rather I followed blindly, something I will never do again.

I changed my opinion of Surface after I talked with the Editor, Mr. Lagtapon. Contrary to popular belief, Surface people are not closed minded rather, what I received was respect, understanding and patience. The conversation was a bridge for me to understanding the complexities, problems and social ills in society. It was an education for me. If I had this knowledge prior to the referendum, I would have voted yes and persuaded others to vote yes.

As a first year student, I made my first error: I judged a book by its cover. Never again. I greatly respect Mr. Lagtapon for going on with Surface even though he faces an uphill battle with little support.

HIV: Waiting and Wondering

Am I your typical Queen's student. I take part in the usual student activities: attend classes, go out to bars, keg parties, and whatnot. I've had what I would consider an average sexual history, including several occasions of unprotected sex. I had always considered pregnancy the immediate threat. I'm not naive. I have always been aware of the AIDS question. However, until this past month it had been too unthinkable to even consider. Well, I'm considering it now.

I think of HIV testing from two distinct perspectives. The moral one, and the personal one. Morally, we have the duty to be aware of our sexual health in order to protect others. Personally, I'd like to avoid the issue entirely. I do not think I am alone in these sentiments.

I've just recently begun a new relationship. Very early on in this relationship the "protect sexual encounters" question came up. I can't explain how, but it finally put into sharp focus the literal life and death reality which I am now facing. Since then, this issue has been consuming my life. Everything else has fallen into the realm of insignificance. The very real possibility that I have been exposed to the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) has thrown me into a constant state of anxiety.

Last Monday, while watching an episode of Jenny Jones (of all things) there was a reference to the guest being worried about being HIV-positive. I knew then that I had to know one way or the other what my HIV status is. I like to think that it's unlikely that I am HIV-positive, but the bottom line is that it is possible.

I picked up the phone and made an appointment with student health to get tested, thinking this the only reasonable course of action. Later that day I confided in a friend about this, and she made me aware of some important HIV-testing facts - facts which everybody should be made aware of.

The HIV test can be administered at many hospitals and health care centres in Kingston, but there are some significant differences with respect to confidentiality. There are three types of tests based on how they are recorded on your medical file.

1. Nominal test: the test result is linked to the "testee" via the physician and kept on record. This is legally required.

2. Non-nominal test: the test result is linked to the "testee" by a code or fake name. This code is known only by the physician and testee and is kept on file. It is also known as the confidential test.

3. Anonymous test: the test result is linked to the "testee" through a code which is known to the patient exclusively. No record of the test or test result is made.

Student Health Services provides a confidential, non-nominal test. The name of the person pursuing the test is not identified to the lab. It is confidential such that only that person and their physician are aware of the test, but it must be legally recorded on that person's medical file, as all patient/physician interactions are. In light of the present uncertainty of HIV/AIDS status and insurance, job opportunities, etc., medical records of HIV testing, regardless of results, could represent future problems.

A solution to this concern is to seek anonymous testing. (Anonymous tests are the safest bets for insurance purposes.) This information can easily be gained by calling any AIDS hotline, or better yet, the local AIDS Project. In Kingston, anonymous testing is offered at the Kingston, Frontenac, Lennox and Addington Health Units. There is no fee for this test, and no health card is required. Clients must fill out a form but they do not have to use their real names or addresses. No patient files are kept. Their phone number is 549-1233. Give them a call (ask for Liz or Diane).

The Kingston AIDS Project, Student Health Services and Peer Health offer good sound advice, information and counselling on HIV/AIDS. Don't be afraid to use their excellent services.

The reason I am writing this is simple. I know I am not alone. It is essential that you and I are aware of our options. In the end, despite our personal reservations, we have to get answers to these questions that are haunting us. Could I be HIV-positive?

After learning that a non/initial or non-nominal test could be held against me in the future, I opted for the anonymous test. My appointment was yesterday. I am scared shitless of what my result will be. However, the sooner I know, the sooner I can regain some semblance of order into my life.

was that ASUS should not blindly follow the will of the majority. Simply put, he said I was supporting an argument for collective rights with an example of individual ones. However, my intention was to support an argument for not blindly following the will of the majority with an example of individual rights. Doherty argues that "instead of a minority paper [we should] have a literary one." I have no problem with artistic expression but I do have a problem with the "instead" part of his argument. Most people who oppose Surface do so because they are unaware of the mechanisms in place to ensure it can't cross the line. I do not believe that most students are opposed to the idea of a minority paper. Doherty, however, wants to replace the minority paper. How sad. Once again, I'd like to ask those of you reading not to believe those who tell you The Journal and Golden Words can adequately address concerns of minorities. The simple fact is that a minority paper is necessary on campus.

Lord, make me an instrument of your peace.
Where there is hatred, let me sow love,
Where there is injury, pardon;
Where there is doubt, faith;
Where there is despair, hope;
Where there is darkness, light;
Where there is sadness, joy;
O divine Master, Grant that I may not so much seek
To be consoled, as to console,
To be understood, as to understand,
To be loved, as to love,
For it is in giving that we receive;
It is in pardoning that we are pardoned;
It is in dying that we are born to eternal life.

Baby, if you've ever wondered

The following essay has been written by Edmond Cape, a Queen's alumnus. Originally composed as a letter to a friend, the essay reflects on Cape's experiences at Queen's and the challenges he has faced since graduating.

After our last telephone conversation, I was inspired to write you the following chapter. I began writing this evening after we spoke on the phone - a time when you were composing a poem about a dream...

I am in a great mood. Let me tell you why. November 17th, 1992, I attended the Queen's alumni dinner. I was a little nervous because I was not sure who would be there for I went with only one friend. However, the evening turned out to be an absolute success. Amongst many people hiding behind a rehearsed response to the question of the night, "so what have you been up to?", and having nothing much else to say, I met a woman - you. How I met her I am not quite sure. It seems to me that she was just there and we began talking.

In the middle of a room filled with words of false bravado and thousand dollar gowns, I was listening to a person who was real. We discussed how things were tough and getting to us all. We went to university, an institution offering a diverse range of experiences through which we would discover who we were. Upon receiving our diploma, jobs that we had worked hard to get were supposed to be waiting.

Instead of being content, deserved perhaps because we have graduated, we were uneasy. There was an internal struggle so deep within us that we found ourselves questioning our self-worth. It's amazing that you, a person who has travelled to Europe, taught in Barcelona, has a keen interest in coaching dance gymnastics, graduated from one of the best universities (really the best university in Canada... a biased opinion no doubt) in a most competitive faculty, and best of all who turned a twenty dollar dress into a million dollar gown, was sad about what was ahead. I could only relate completely but I knew about what we had to focus on.

It was time to lend merit to our accomplishments and use them to fuel our confidence for the new challenges ahead - experiences that will teach us more about who we are. From examples of people before us who are excelling in their career we see that a successful career could not materialize without first knowing who we are. They understand themselves and have used that information to shape their career. That is what we need to do more than ever - learn about who we are and use it to redefine the traditional jobs that were once so easy to get. We are the generation of 'have nots'. We are going against the strongest economic tide of any our parents ever had to fight. For the first time ever in the history of the industrialized world, a university degree does not guarantee success - it is questionable that it ever did - but let us not discuss the word "success." Current jobs have become obsolete which means that our success as individuals requires that we redefine our goals.

To meet this end we will do some self-exploration, you and me, by reading books we may not have otherwise have read. From written words we may learn and experience what others have experienced. We will write words we may never have written, go places and meet people... But best of all, you and I will get to know each other in a very special way, more than if all had been smooth sailing. "Everything worthwhile comes with hard work," but perhaps this is only true because it is the hard work in itself that makes it worth it. For me this raises a very important point: working more and more towards a goal in itself should be rewarding. The tragedy in Death of a Salesman was not so much that Willy Lowman was pursuing the wrong dreams, but that he failed to find happiness in that pursuit. The fact that you are writing a poem about a dream - a dream you are not sure will come true, plus the fact that you have travelled halfway around the world to pursue your search, clearly demonstrates success. In the face of so many who accept mediocrity, or a career that does not make them happy (80% of people in North America today would rather be pursuing something other than their current jobs), what you are doing is great in itself.

We are the generation of 'have nots.' We are going against the strongest economic tide of any our parents ever had to fight.

Find happiness in what you are doing for what it is. Initially the pursuit may be difficult. If I may, let me tell you about an event that most changed my life.

During my first two years at Queen's I thought I was pursuing something worthwhile but I was not sure what this something was. I had no direction and consequently I performed poorly which upset me even more. For a while I could not see a way out. At the onset of my second year I sought escape through sex. I would be in her room twelve hours a day hoping that each time somehow I would feel so much that I would forget about what I was doing at Queen's. After the break-up sometime in January, every now and then I would smoke up day or night during the week, again trying to escape my reality. But to no avail: my scholastic performance, drove me to think about suicide, driving me to tears on several occasions.

During the summers I would escape to Martha's Vineyard. It was a place where we at one time had a house on the ocean. My father would always get up at dawn to take photos, photos that would later win several prizes. He played a first rate game of tennis, always being amongst the final eight in any tournament. He would take my sister Mer and I to get ice cream sometimes three times a day - needless to say he liked ice cream. He always had the same thing, a strawberry shake. I would always have chocolate ice cream with chocolate jimmies on a sugar cone... always. He taught me how to swing the racket; basically he showed me how to appreciate a job well done as opposed to half assing it - like I would later be doing in school at Queen's. Martha's Vineyard was a place that I would escape to after each year at Queen's. Within a week of finishing my last exam I was in the car so that when the sun rose I was in line for the ferry boat ride to the island. Spending any time at home just did not seem right. Once on the Vineyard, I would spend my first evening on the beach, which faced the open ocean. The waves would lull me to my much needed sleep.

Within two days, I was painting during the day, sometimes up to 16 hours per day. There can be no doubt that I made a lot of money, sometimes over a thousand dollars a week. The summer after my first year at Queen's I bought my antique Porsche. I was it the first day on the island. That summer I lived in an A-frame with enough room for a single cot and a chair, to ensure that I was paying a minimum amount of rent. It seemed that I was desperate to own that car. By mid-June I was driving the car. I brought price down by renting my original car to a friend, and working a minimum of fifty hours a week.

The next summer was the summer after my second year at Queen's. That year I crashed, for all practical purposes. Whatever it was that I was so desperate for now somehow involved wanting to purchase a 26 foot sailboat. Later you will see that the boat turned out to be a blessing in disguise. But first let me describe the disguise. The stress it caused was immense. I could not understand myself. Why could I not just let go? I remember before I even saw the boat I was talking to my sister Dianna, telling her how I was going to buy this boat, knowing full well that I should not. After all it did not make any sense and I knew it. I remember being in tears with Di, describing how I could not understand why I was so depressed. I was exhausted but could not stop with what I was doing. I bought the boat almost in spite of the way I was feeling toward myself.

After the break-up sometime in January, every now and then I would smoke up day or night during the week, again trying to escape my reality.

The day we put her in the water we discovered a leak in the keel area. The third day in the water we experienced unforeseen hurricane winds of up to 90 miles per hour. The winds began at 1 a.m. and peaked at both 3 a.m. and 8 a.m. The rain felt like bullets on my skin. I was cold and although I was not outright scared, I was worried about the slow leak still remaining from the previous repair. It seemed that it must be getting bigger because there was a lot of water at the bottom of my boat needing to be continually pumped out. Meantime, my boat was smashing and smashing against the boat moored beside it despite the presence of large bumpers between them. Some of the screws for the deck compartments were leaking rain and ocean water into the cabin. The person beside us, Jon-Gin, was pissed because our boats were smashing against each other like crazy. His boat was his life and he knew it. I was feeling very badly, for there was little I could do except listen to what he had to say and DO IT. When the sun finally broke over the horizon I stayed with Jon in his boat. To hear the radio was to hear a description of chaos. Boats were adrift all around the island. This also meant that boats were smashed up on shore. Within the harbour we were able to glimpse at boats pulling their moorings down the harbour. Boats were smashing against boats that were docked. There was so little anyone could do. To relieve pressure on our mooring Jon would start up his motor, a 6 cylinder diesel, to help push against the wind.

At the end of it all, we escaped relatively unscathed. However, this only meant that the boat was still floating. Jon-Gin's boat was fine. On my boat however, the side that was against Jon's boat required major repair. I lived on the rest of the summer and left it up to my partner to take it out of the water during the off-season. Needless to say that after the storm, he had his desire to be any more of a partner in the 'sinking ship.' The final nail in the coffin came when I had returned the next spring to find out that he had yet to take it out of the water. The winter was brutal. The boat looked like hell. Furthermore, he took the motor and lost it somewhere. It was not worth pursuing. I paid to have it taken out and stored until I finally sold it for $4000 less than what I paid for it just one year before.

Through this experience I met Jon-Gin - a blessing. At the end of the summer when the boat was moored beside Jon, I went on a ten day trip leaving from Martha's Vineyard to New Jersey. I was only too happy to get away from all the stress - stress that I had created.

For ten wonderful days, all I thought about was where we were going and what ocean fish we would have to face. It was great. Food was plentiful, the company mellow, we had hot showers, beers, and books. Within the first few hours of the trip, the adventure began. At the end of the first day we realized we had some problems with the engine. We spent the next day taking off the engine head, replacing the gaskets and attempting to repair a minor leak in one of the pistons. With my experience during the winter, when instead of studying for a Biology 200 exam I began to completely overhaul my Porsche engine, I was right there to help Jon out. The satisfaction of repairing the motor successfully was great because it really was a big job. A job that we did while moored in the harbour.

The next few days consisted of sailing to various ports. Sometimes we would have to sail all day and into the night but other days we were at our destinations by the early afternoon. The New England harbours were beautiful. Little taxi boats would come in the morning offering a variety of continental breakfasts and collecting the mooring fee. Some nights we splurged going to wonderful restaurants by the water. One night we befriended the staff and got absolutely drunk. Normally I never really got drunk. Perhaps it was because I never felt I had the right to celebrate. That night I had a great deal of thoughtless fun. We one and this girl who would later sleep with Jon got to hear Jon's stories of his life. For some reason he took a liking to me and taught me about big boat sailing. He was impressed by what I knew about trimming a sail and the various ways of using a jib. It had been a while since I had the opportunity to use what I learned racing Laser II's. I really enjoyed being at the helm of his boat. When everything was trimmed just right, there is nothing like moving by the force of wind.

That night I decided to be on my own. The bar scene was phenomenal. There were bands playing REM cover songs, bars with the funkiest of decorations.

Our next stop was Newport, Rhode Island. You have to see it to believe it. Approaching the harbour from the sea you see the mansions - and they were mansions. The boats and the harbour were breathtaking. The aura of times before was everywhere: Fitzgerald, the roaring 20's, the club, the Kennedys, it was all there. That night I decided to be on my own. The bar scene was phenomenal. There were bands playing REM cover songs, bars with the funkiest of decorations. I stopped in one to play pool and hang out for a bit. It was great. There were restaurants and shops along the water... The lighting made everything so breathtaking and so full of energy. The ships, private and presidential, were powerful. All in all the energy was undeniable and I was there and thus a part of it. This was something I had not felt for quite a while. I had always felt outside everything that had been going on in my life, felt not really a part of it. I never really began to see the possibilities before that overwhelming day.

We finished sailing the Long Island Sound to enter the East River. I saw old mansions infested with plant growth and birds, lots of birds and barges piled up with garbage. I had never seen anything like it. The downtown buildings right up against the water... to see the reflection of our boat against these buildings was overwhelming. There was a park with African-American children playing, mothers watching, and people jogging. On the water we saw a floating jail. Atop the live story barge were black men with their hands grasping the fence, looking down at me, perhaps feeling resentful, perhaps judging me as a white piece of shit - I don't know. I did not shy away but rather looked straight at them. I don't know exactly what I felt, but I felt that we were feeling it together because we were in it together.

wondered whatever became of me...

I wanted somehow to connect with what I was seeing. Words would not do it, so I just looked.

When we approached the Statue of Liberty, the sun was setting behind her. We could not have drawn a more beautiful sight. By the time the island was behind us, the New York skyline was glowing. I was listening to the rap DJ's telling us 'the way it is.' My ears and eyes were flooded with 'the way it is.' The evening winds picked up just enough to make it worth it to shut off the engine. Taken back by all the lights and the sound of the water I was blown away.

For the first time in my life I felt that I was seeing things the way they were. I was depressed because I was not doing well in school. But there was no reason why I could not see Queen's. In high school I won the Governor General's award. I was independent of my parents. I could go anywhere and somehow make it on my own, something I had been doing since twelve years of age when I began going to boarding school. At the Vineyard I was financially independent. I had demonstrated that I could work hard and there was no way I was a Sluff. I wanted to be a doctor. I did not want to make money just for money, as I had been doing so desperately for the past two summers. I wanted to look in the eyes of the men looking down at me at Long Island and feel a connection. I am no better than they, but I have a chance to somehow be a part of everything and everyone around me. I felt a sense that we were all in 'this' together and that somehow we will make it, we will be happy.

I got off the boat in New Jersey to catch a bus to Manhattan to visit my stepfather (in the process of becoming my ex-stepfather) to tell him the news: I was not going to quit school but rather go back to work my ass off. That year I brought my GPA up twenty points, managing to ace two courses. In many ways I guess the rest is history. The struggle has not been easy, as you know: that year I found out that I had a learning disability, making it more difficult for me to reach my aspired academic goals.

Although the road is not as straight as I had

I did not want to make money just for money, as I had been doing so desperately for the past two summers. I wanted to look in the eyes of the men looking down at me at Long Island and feel a connection.

hoped, with every obstacle I am forced to question my commitment to my goals. This brings me back to where we began. Finding happiness is striving for a goal. "When it is all mixed up, I want to break it down." When all my hard work does not pay off I want to break down. In other words, I want to reassess my goals and reasons for having these goals. Consequently not only do I become more dedicated to those goals, but the goals become more and more specific. For example, as you know, last summer I was on a waiting list for Medicine until September when finally they advised me that I was not accepted. This setback forced me to question my commitment to becoming a physician. Having decided to commit to that end, I am completing my M.Sc. at McGill. As it turns out, this experience has given me an opportunity to get more specific about what I want to do in medicine. Furthermore, it has given me a chance to put myself in a stronger position for going to school at McGill, presently my first choice for medicine.

This brings me to your poem about a dream, a dream you are not sure will come true. It is true that our dream to find something in which we excel may never come true, it obviously depends on your definition of 'excelling.' It definitely does not imply getting the best marks - the creator of Microsoft dropped out of Harvard. It does not mean making the most money - Nobel prize winners and olympic athletes contest to that. What does 'excelling' mean? To me it means making a unique contribution to society. The quality of this contribution will come from the quality of the pursuit towards your goal.

Perhaps these are difficult things for you to believe. On my trip to New York, nothing had changed except the way I saw things. That in itself somehow changed me. Once you see that, the possibilities become clear. It was clear to me that I could be a doctor where before it was not. I could not do well at Queen's initially because I did not know where I was going. My desire to excel forced me to stop and figure out my goals early. Perhaps for you such an analysis was not so critical. You did well throughout your academic career. But now when the definition of 'excelling' is less clear, i.e. not defined by marks, you are now facing some tough questions, questions I had to start asking during my trip. It is interesting: at the beginning of that summer, on the phone with Dianna when I was trying desperately to figure out why I was feeling the way I did, I could not get an answer. But when I had time to relax and stop thinking about all the immediate shit in front of me, it came so clearly.

Another thing I did was to free myself of my obligation to return to Queen's. I felt comfortable with the idea that I may not return, unless I found my own reason to. That also contributed very much to my ability to see things clearly: the idea that I could stop going to Queen's meant I could do what I want, and what I wanted for the first time had nothing to do with family expectations. Although there were expectations, I also placed them upon myself, thinking that going to Queen's would make me happy. I let go of it all and found that I could be comfortable with it. I was happy during that trip. Initially though, it was scary letting go of the assumption that Queen's would make me happy. It seemed I had nothing else. It would explain why I felt so desperate about my poor performance at school.

And now to you. What experiences do you hope to take with you and how are they going to give you confidence in your next challenge? How is your experience giving you confidence in your current challenge? What did you get from Queen's? If one were to take those experiences away what do you think you would have lost? What would you not know that you know now?

Men's soccer: A season to remember

BY MARC LABROM
The Queen's Journal

With a nine-game undefeated streak and an OUA A championship banner under their belts, the men's soccer Gaels fully expected to continue their success at the national level, and return from competition in the CIAU championships with even greater rewards. Unfortunately, it was not to be.

Having lost OUA A rookie All-Star Brendan Johnson and midfielder Dan Cheney to injuries en route to their OUA A crown, the Gaels travelled to Acadia University for the championships on the hump, and somewhat worn out from the grind of a 19-game season. With spirits sky-high, and a promising draw awaiting them in Wolfville, however, Queen's nevertheless appeared anxious to justify its presence at CI's. The Gaels headed into their opener against Atlantic champion St. Francis Xavier with only victory on their minds.

Greeted with a steady drizzle and appalling field conditions, the Gaels set themselves down to their task of dispatching the X-Men, only to find their efforts futile in the face of the unforgiving elements. Goal-scoring chances were at a premium, as both teams' offenses found themselves mired in a mid-field that might have passed for a flooded cow pasture.

But while the weather left both attacks benign, it did little to deter Queen's midfielder Pete Milonas from asserting complete hegemony over the midfield and claiming Player-of-the-Game honours. Crashing into tackles and distributing the ball extremely well, the OUA A's best centre-half seemed intent on single-handedly vanquishing the Xavier side. Unfortunately and unjustly it would seem, however, his efforts proved fruitless as Queen's forwards squandered any scoring opportunities Milonas created.

Having settled for a scoreless draw against St. F.X. in their first match, the Gaels now turned their attention towards beating Sherbrooke and securing a berth in the final against UBC. Contesting their second match in less than 24 hours, Queen's play seemed listless early on.

The Gaels quickly fell prey to the deadly strikes of the tournament's MVP and spearhead of Sherbrooke's offense, Eric Puig. Left to fish the ball from the back of his net on three separate occasions, goalkeeper Liam Stevenson could only watch helplessly as his once-impenetrable defense crumbled before the Quebec champs' onslaught.

Peter Milonas' marker midway through the second half would prove the only bright spot in the Gaels' 3-1 loss.

Sherbrooke would go on to beat UBC for the gold medal.

Their two sub-par performances behind them (or so they thought), the Gaels now found themselves vying for the bronze with their new-found nemesis, Western. With the Mustangs thirsty for revenge after losing to the Gaels a week earlier in the OUA A final, one would think the match promised a bitterly-fought battle between the two sides. If it was the case, someone clearly failed to inform the Queen's squad.

After an early miscue by sweeper Marc Labrom spurred Western to a 1-0 lead, the Gaels found it difficult to produce any significant pressure on the Mustangs' defense, much less equalize. A second Western goal ten minutes into the second half sealed the Gaels' fate, and left them homebound but empty-handed.

Their lacklustre performance in the Maritimes aside, the Gaels' season has proven, to say the least, to be an immensely successful one. They can only look forward eagerly to a repeat performance of their exploits next year. Felicitations! May the long winter stiffen the Gaels' resolve to not squander another chance at national gold.

FRANK & EARNEST

Leafs, Rangers biggest surprises so far

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

Surprises abound at the NHL's quarter mark. However, regular-season play means little, and it's tough to project November's scintillating form into May's playoff success.

Leafs lead league

It's been a long time, but Leaf fans are coming out of the closet. To the surprise of many, the Toronto Maple Leafs picked up right where they left off after last spring's strong playoff run, which took them within one game of the Stanley Cup final. Large new contracts were awarded to goalie Felix Potvin, captain Wendel Clark, and superstar Doug Gilmour, and those three have justified the megabucks by playing the best hockey of their lives. Clark in particular has been scary, with 22 goals in 24 games.

It's worth noting defenseman Michel Petit is the only player still with Calgary after that big five-for-five deal with the Leafs two years ago, which brought Gilmour to the Big Smoke. Toronto GM Cliff Fletcher fleeced the Flames, his old team, on that one, getting the Leafs back on the road to respectability. Last spring's Buffalo trade of goalie Grant Fuhr for forward Dave Andreychuk is again making Fletcher look like a genius. Andreychuk has 29 points in 24 games, while Fuhr's goals-against average is a high 4.27. John Cullen returned strongly from injury, and coach Pat Burns has been a master at getting solid work from his grinders. For Toronto to go further, they must stay healthy, especially Clark. Some young Leafs such as Yannick Perreault, Rob Pearson, and Drake Berehowsky must mature quickly and step up with quality time.

Rangers on track

Ah, yes, the New York Rangers. This schizophrenic team has built a 14-game unbeaten streak to lead the Atlantic Division. There's no doubt new coach Mike Keenan is in charge — strong-willed Mike eliminated the fratricidal feuding which saw the Broadway Blueshirts go from first overall in 1991-92 to the golf course last April. He's got his highly skilled players all skating in the same direction.

However, the Rangers have some very heavy past disappointments to overcome, like no Stanley Cup since 1940. Keenan previously coached talented teams with Philadelphia and Chicago, but couldn't get the Flyers or the Hawks over the hump in the playoffs. Both he and the Rangers have lots to prove.

Injuries to superstars Mario

Leinieux, Eric Lindros, Steve Yzerman and Pat LaFontaine must worry a league which is basing its new marketing strategy on stars. Will Lemieux ever be the same after battling Hodgkins' disease and back problems? After a fiery start, Lindros, who missed substantial time last season with injuries, is out again with problems with both knees. This has to be a big contract to lead the Flyers, who traded the farm AND the ranch to the Nordiques to get him.

The five new, newer and newest teams (San Jose, Ottawa, Tampa Bay, Anaheim and Florida) are more competitive than most expected. The key reason? The expansion draft allowed established teams to protect only one goalie. That spread the goal-tending talent around. Among the expansion outfits, only Ottawa (4.86) has a goals-against average over 3.50.

Disappointments? Start with Detroit. Scotty Bowman got a big contract to lead the Wings to the promised land, but so far the NHL's winningest coach hasn't been able to get this enigmatic team to reach its potential.

Oilers left for dead

The Edmonton Oilers, with only three wins in 24 games, are going down the toilet. How bad is it? Well, the Oilers' dynasty won five Stanley Cups in seven years, the most recent in 1990, only three years ago. Five expansion teams have since joined the league, and right now the Oilers are worse than ALL of them. When Toronto visited Edmonton recently, most fans at the game were cheering for the Leafs! Only the Reichmanns fell so far so fast.

People say the Oilers will move to Minnesota, but they've already moved. "Oilers East" are the Rangers (Mark Messier, Esa Tikkanen, Kevin Lowe), and "Oilers West" are the Los Angeles Kings (Wayne Gretzky, Jarri Kurri, Charlie Huddy). With Paul Coffey in Detroit, Grant Fuhr in Buffalo, Glenn Anderson and Mike Krushelnyski in Toronto, Marty McSorley in Pittsburgh and Andy Moog in Dallas, it adds to an immense mob of infuriated Oilers fans.

Oilers' owner Peter Pocklington, who wants to move the team, is being sued by the Alberta government over $60 million of 1987 loans. Alberta is seeking a court order to freeze Pocklington's assets, and an injunction has also been filed, forbidding Peter Puck from negotiating further with Minnesota. The mercenary Pocklington has raped the Oilers of possibly the best talent any team ever had. This messy situation looks like it will get a whole lot messier.

Gaels streak ends

BY ANDREW TURNER
The Queen's Journal

Challenge began in 1986-87 as part of the International Hockey Hall of Fame (IHHF) Museum Centennial celebration to honour the hockey competition between RMC and Queen's. That first game saw RMC defeat Queen's by a score of 8-3. The Gaels then proceeded to dominate the series by winning the next six meetings. Until last Saturday night.

The streak came to an end when the Gaels dropped a 5-2 decision to the Redmen from RMC. With a full house on hand, predominantly RMC fans, the opening 10 minutes saw good chances at both ends of Hoops have hopes to avenge losses

BY ROB THOMPSON
The Queen's Journal

The men's basketball Gaels provided thrills-a-plenty last weekend as they split their weekend games with McGill and Guelph. Both contests required overtime to settle the decision. Friday night, Queen's topped the McGill Redmen by a 69-60 count. Sunday, they dropped a hard fought contest 97-93 to the Guelph Gryllons.

Friday's game was a slow defensive affair which lacked any pace until the final minutes of the game. In the first ten minutes, the Gaels could only muster nine points. Fortunately for the home side, McGill was only able to hoop eight points over the same time span. These offensive woes persisted through the majority of the game.

McGill's big men, in particular 6'10 centre Doug McMahon, prevented the Gaels from mounting any serious threat in the paint. Half of Queen's 32 first half points came from the charity stripe, and outside shots provided the balance of the scoring for the Gaels. McGill's offensive game plan was simple — get the ball to Doug McMahon.

McMahon accounted for a third of the Redmen's points, counting 20 on the evening. His scoring was highlighted by three monstrous jumps. Had McGill adhered to that game plan more rigorously, the game likely wouldn't have gone to overtime, as McMahon seemed able to score at will on several occasions during the game.

The teams went to the locker room with Queen's in front 32-29. The second half provided more of the same. Queen's continued to have difficulty scoring inside, registering only six points from the paint in the second half. It was outside shooting that kept the Gaels in the game. Queen's also couldn't enjoy the luxury of frequent trips to the line, as the Redmen didn't commit a foul until 5:58 remained in the game.

The score see-sawed throughout the second half, and with 3:30 to go McGill led by their largest margin 55-50. A three pointer by Sean Smith, pulled the Gaels within two, and after a McGill basket, Mike Ruscitti's three pulled the Gaels within one with 1:20 to play. The Redmen sank only one of their two free throws, opening the door for the Gaels. A tip-in by Les Harold with five seconds to play brought the count even, and sent the match into overtime.

The extra frame saw an entirely new Gaels squad. They totally dominated the Redmen, outscoring them 11-2. Queen's played like a much more confident team, driving to the hole, and feeding their men in the paint to register their points. All this without their leading scorer on the night, Wyeth Clarkson with 16 points, who had fouled out with 2:13 left in regulation time. Rookie Mickey Stonowski counted six of his eight points in overtime.

Other top scorers for the Gaels, were Sean Smith with 12, and Mike Ruscitti with 11.

Sunday afternoon's game was a much more exciting affair. Both Queen's and Guelph showcased some impressive team speed, and as a result scoring was much more plentiful.

Guelph jumped out to an early lead, thanks to some outstanding shooting by Chris O'Rourke. Heled all scorers on the afternoon with 33 points, including 21 in the first half. The Gaels hung tough, however, and overcame an early six point deficit, to lead by as many as nine during the first half. Outside shooting was again an important factor in the Queen's offensive attack, but they moved the ball inside more frequently than in Friday's game.

At half time, the teams were back where they started, deadlocked at 48.

The second half showed a

Gaels fought, but came up short. Bohdan Yakymczuk

Costly missed free throws by the Gaels allowed the Gryllons back into the game. An off-balance three-pointer by O'Rourke with 20 seconds remaining knotted the game at 86, and that was how regulation time ended.

In the overtime session, the Gryllons went to Chris O'Rourke, who scored five more, including a four point play with 3:30 to go. The Gaels best efforts were not enough, as Guelph pulled away for the 97-93 victory. The Gaels were led on the afternoon by Wyeth Clarkson who had 22 points. Sean Smith wasn't far behind with 21 points, including six from three point land. Also in double figures for Queen's were Mike Ruscitti with 19, and Mark Holland and Mickey Stonowski with 11.

The Gaels had no reason to hang their heads after Sunday's loss. Even without leading scorer Dave Smart, and mainstay Corwin Cambridge, they played what is arguably their best game of the year. They showed an intensity that has not been there thus far this season. Look for the Gaels to make some noise when they begin their regular season after the holiday break.

Third Place at SkyDome

BY MELANIE HOWARD
The Queen's Journal

Queen's Competitive Cheerleading has finally come of age. On Friday, Nov. 19, the team travelled to Toronto's SkyDome to compete at the ninth annual Canadian Universities' Cheerleading Competition. The team of six men and ten women placed third at the national-level event, and now rank second among co-ed teams in Canada.

Queen's thrilled the crowd with their routine. Head coach Sandy Han, an Education student at Queen's, was playing spirited hockey, the power play was not clicking and they were not able to capitalize on good scoring opportunities. Consequently, the Gaels went to the dressing room down by a point.

The second period saw good chances for both sides. In particular, Gosselin was given a great opportunity five minutes into the period on a crafty feed from Andrew Clark but he was stoned by the Redmen. The early going of the period saw the Gaels get several scoring opportunities. Finally, the intensity paid off when after sustained pressure, Brian Mueggler scored his first of the night on a wrap-around at 4:05 of the period. Indicative of the Gaels intensity in the third was their physical game, particularly the continued physical play of both Morin and Jamie Dinsmore. The intense play of the Gaels forced the Redmen into taking an interference penalty at 5:40. The ensuing power play saw the Gaels controlling the puck, led by Dan Brown on the point. RMC was finally able to relieve the pressure by dumping the puck the length of the ice, and then the unthinkable happened.

With an RMC player forechecking deep, goaltender Bill Landry misplayed the puck behind the net and coughed it up to the RMC player. He then put the puck out front where an incoming Redmen had no problem putting the puck past Landry as he tried to scramble back into position. That short handed goal put the Gaels down by a score of 4-1 and the RMC fans the ice with RMC finally opening the scoring on a rebound right in front of the net at 11:57 of the period. Derek Morin and Jeff Gosselin tried to ignite the Queen's offense with several great hits on the Redmen. Unfortunately, in the eyes of the referees, good hits are called interference penalties in this league.

RMC went up 2-0 on a wrap-around play that goalie Bill Landry could not get a beat on. The RMC forward came around the net unopposed and slid the puck past the unprepared Queen's goalie. While Queen's was playing spirited hockey, the power play was not clicking and they were not able to capitalize on good scoring opportunities. Consequently, the Gaels went to the dressing room down by a point.

Although the Gaels were down 3-0 heading into the third period, the game was anything but over. The Gaels came out fighting in the last period. They were hungry and they proceeded to take the play to the Redmen. The early going of the period saw the Gaels get several scoring opportunities. Finally, the intensity paid off when after sustained pressure, Brian Mueggler scored his first of the night on a wrap-around at 4:05 of the period. Indicative of the Gaels intensity in the third was their physical game, particularly the continued physical play of both Morin and Jamie Dinsmore. The intense play of the Gaels forced the Redmen into taking an interference penalty at 5:40. The ensuing power play saw the Gaels controlling the puck, led by Dan Brown on the point. RMC was finally able to relieve the pressure by dumping the puck the length of the ice, and then the unthinkable happened.

With an RMC player forechecking deep, goaltender Bill Landry misplayed the puck behind the net and coughed it up to the RMC player. He then put the puck out front where an incoming Redmen had no problem putting the puck past Landry as he tried to scramble back into position. That short handed goal put the Gaels down by a score of 4-1 and the RMC fans figured the victory was in the basket. The Gaels had other ideas. They continued pressing the Redmen and just after the power play expired, Brian Mueggler scored his second of the game at 7:49. With continued pressure, the stage was set for the possibility of a full comeback by the Gaels. However, a questionable coaching decision (or indecision) in the final two minutes of the game ended any hopes of the Gaels pulling out a tie.

With just under two minutes left in the game, the Gaels were deep in the RMC zone applying considerable pressure. This seemed to be an opportune time to pull the goalie and send out an extra attacker. But the call was not made and Landry stayed in the net. RMC was finally able to clear the zone, albeit feebly. They were able to get the puck into Queen's territory and with 0:49 left in the game, the Gaels found themselves still down two goals. Landry still in the net, and involved in a faceoff on the wrong side of the centre line.

After the draw, the goalie was finally pulled, but all to no avail. Craig Isemer of the Redmen scored

Athlete of the Week

Wyeth Clarkson, a guard with the men's basketball Gaels, is The Journal's Athlete of the Week. Clarkson excelled in two exciting games last weekend. Queen's beat McGill 69-60 in overtime on Friday, and lost to Guelph 97-93, again in overtime, on Sunday. Clarkson led Gaels' scoring in both games, hitting 16 against McGill and on campus, the team can be seen cheering at all men's and women's home basketball games. Their next competition is the Ontario Universities Championship, which will take place in March.

Swim, no cycle or run

BY SIMON BARON
The Queen's Journal

On Nov 15, the Queen's Triathlon Association competed in the first event of the interuniversity Multisport Event Series at the Regency Racquet Club in Brampton. The concept for the race was simple: relay teams of five people, swimming 25 to 50 metres at a time — first one to complete 10km takes home the hardware.

The Queen's presence at the swim relay could not be ignored. Only Queen's and Western sent more than one team. Western sent two and Queen's fielded five full teams.

However, not only was Queen's visible in the pool, they also dominated the university standings, taking five of the top 10 positions. Queen's A (J. Chisholm, M. Counsell, A. Ransom, K. Graham, and M. Rydlo) completed 10km in one hour 38 minutes, to take second place, finishing narrowly behind the University of Windsor. Queen's C (A. Fox, K. Kearns, T. Morton, M. Neill, and L. Pedwell) and Queen's B (S. Baron, K. Blight, T. Harrison, V. Lau, and K. Oliver) placed sixth and seventh with times of 2:03 and 2:07 respectively.

Queen's E (D. Dagnone, R. McGuigan, B. Powell), S. Theben, C. Topp) and Queen's D (A. Mason, K. Miller, K. Munroe, J. Smyth, D. Watt) rounded out the top 10. Queen's E finishing 9550m in the time limit of 2:10 and Queen's D finishing 9500m. This event puts Queen's in second place in the series rankings, behind Windsor and ahead of Western.

V-ball women start to gel

BY KARCH KIRALY and SHIJUN SMITH
The Queen's Journal

The Queen's women's volleyball team has finally begun league play! Their first match was against the University of Ottawa, on their home court. The two teams are very evenly matched in talent, and the Gaels knew it would be a battle to win. Furthermore, the Gee-Gees are always at the top of their mental game, and will not be silenced easily. In the end, the Gaels lost the match 3-1. Disappointed, the Gaels pointed to mental errors to account for the loss.

The following day, the Gaels dragged themselves back up to performance state, to face off against the Carleton Ravens. Although it was Carleton who put the Gaels out of the play-offs last year, the Gaels came out on top this time, 3-1. Sally

Thomas was heard to have said, "Ah, revenge is sweet."

Last weekend the Gaels were in Toronto, facing off against the York Yeowomen and the ever-powerful Ryerson Lady Rams. York is currently ranked sixth in the CIAU. Nevertheless, the Gaels came out flat in the opening game, and did not seem to regain confidence for the rest of the night. There was a bright light in the third set, when the Gaels seemed to be shutting down the Yeowomen for a short time. However, York finished the match, with a score of 3-0.

Sunday's match was a happier moment, as the Gaels shut down the Lady Rams 3-0. It should be noted that Amy "Thank-you" Connell, once famous for sleeping on the bench, was out on the court in full force on Sunday. Furthermore, stellar performances were also made by rookies Alison Palmer and Alison McConnell. Great job girls!

Are the Gaels content with their play thus far? Apparently not. The Gaels have had a long pre-season to prepare for league play, but they are not yet performing to the best of their ability. With three new starters on the court this year, it has taken a long time for Queen's to gel as a unit.

This Friday night at 6 p.m. the Gaels play a home match against the U of T Lady Blues. Toronto is currently ranked tenth in the CIAU, making it important for the Gaels to come out at the top of their game. Thus far, it has been mental errors that have put the Gaels behind. However, they are training each day to improve this aspect of the game. Playing in their own gym, with a huge, loud crowd supporting them can only work to their advantage.

an empty net goal at 19:49 to clinch the Carr-Harris Cup for RMC. The final score was 5-2.

The Most Valuable Player awards went to John Hatch from RMC and the Queen's captain, Dan Brown. Brown, who also won the award last year, displayed true class when he gave the award to teammate Mueggler for his two goal effort. If anything, this displays the team approach the Gaels have. Last Saturday they never gave up. Except for some costly errors, the Gaels might have won their seventh straight Carr-Harris Cup. Next weekend the Gaels play both Saturday and Sunday. Two wins are imminent. See you there.

Intramural Update

Rugby-Basketball

BY BEWIC SPORTS DAYS STAFF
The Queen's Journal

This is the third of our articles featuring the sports that make up BEWIC Sports Days. This is the most novel sport of them all - our very own Rugby Basketball.

Rugby Basketball was created five years ago by the BEWIC Sports Days committee. After struggling to find a suitable fourth sport for this coed environment (indoor soccer and soccer baseball were two of the predecessors of rugby basketball) someone had a brainstorm - play basketball with a ball that was unpredictable and thereby equalize the various skill levels that the players would bring to the game. A rugby ball fit that bill nicely, and so rugby basketball was born.

Being able to handle the weird rugby ball bounces was what made these '93 BSD teams stand out amongst all the rest.

It's unorthodox. It's unpredictable. It's crazy. It's rugby basketball!

Intramural Volleyball Tournament

BY ROB CAMP
The Queen's Journal

Oh, the volleyballs were flying this week-end. 14 teams competed in the annual BEWIC Volleyball Tournament. There were spikes and stuffs, slams and digs, serves and volleys as Queen's students showed why volleyball is so popular here. These players are good. As the various teams began to fall to the wayside in the competitive division, it began to be obvious that the two finalists would be the squads that played practically flawless ball. In the end, only Ice Pack and Vertically Challenged were left standing to slug it out in the finals. These undefeated teams put on a fabulous display before V.C. finally succumbed, leaving Ice Pack as the winner. In the BEWIC Recreational Tournament, the team calling themselves Smashing Mohawks walked off with top honours. In all the tournaments was a rousing success.

In other Intramural action playoffs are finishing up as finals are all this week for most sports and there are still two positions open for Bewic Sports Days. So bring your team on in.

Could squash be next?

BY CHRIS JOHNSTON
The Queen's Journal

During this past weekend, the Queen's Men Squash Team gathered in a club somewhere near Peterborough to tackle its Eastern rivals - McGill, Ryerson, Trent and U of T. Expectations were high since the team finished second in the OUAA's last year and filled the spots vacated by grads with two strong rookies - a hard hitting Mark Chatterly and Andrew Guilfoyle who brings with him his enthusiasm and dedication to fitness.

The team left on Thursday to acclimatize themselves and accommodate the academic concerns of certain individuals. Thus, we were fully prepared to tackle our first opponent, McGill. Veterans Keith "Socks" Smith and John "Whowa" Irwin disposed of their players in three quick games. Andrew Guilfoyle, Mark Chatterly and Jeremy Thompson, our fearless player-assistant coach followed up these matches with decisive 3-0 wins of their own. Meanwhile, Chris "Does he really have a goatee?" Johnston battled his opponent to a 3-1 victory to round out Queen's 6-0 crushing defeat of McGill.

The next match was against a Ryerson team that was bigger on fashion than our conservatively well-dressed and talented Gaels. Once again, Guilfoyle, Irwin and Smith - the "big" winners of the night - showed no mercy in their crushing 3-0 victories. Chatterly and Thompson played well in their matches but were unfortunate to lose. The last match of the night began at 10:30 p.m. and wound up finishing around midnight. Veteran Chris Johnston, with his teammates cheering boisterously, was unable to close out his match in part due to some poor officiating and lost in a gruelling 3-2 match. Despite tying 3-3 in matches, Queen's wound up winning the match-up on games won. We hurried back to the hotel to replenish lost fluids and calories. A small group of players managed to survive an early morning excursion into downtown Peterborough in search of more food.

The next morning, much to our surprise, the team (almost everyone) awoke to find Jeremy in a "life-threatening" condition necessitating treatment in T.O. Expecting the squash to take its toll, the team came prepared and treated its babysitter, chauffeur and team manager Rob Evans into action. Despite missing the previous night, Evans had no problems in crushing his Trent and U of T competitors 3-0. Well-rested and well-humoured, the remaining four Gaels, Guilfoyle, Irwin, Johnston and Smith showed superb play in subduing their Trent and U of T combatants. Ottawa native Mark Chatterly played well but lost to highly skilled players. He even managed to take a game off former Canadian junior team member. Overall, the Squash Gaels won 19 of 24 matches and claimed the premiership in the East.

We appreciated the company of Mr. and Mrs. Johnston and look forward to seeing the rest of the squash junkies on January 22-23. Ryerson and February 5-6 at Western as the team attempts to claim the OUAA title. Information regarding road trips will be available next term.

Mullen wins coaching award

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

Bob Mullen, defensive coordinator for the Queen's football Gaels, has been honoured by the CIAU as the most outstanding volunteer assistant coach in the country. Mullen won the Gino Fracas Award during Vanier Cup week in Toronto. He has been a member of the Gaels' coaching staff since 1982, one year after he finished his studies (Arts '80, Ed. '81) at Queen's. Mullen has served as defensive coordinator since 1988.

Mullen was surprised to win. "It means a lot to me," he said. "Recognition from one's peers is always nice. I certainly hold the people I coach against in high regard."

Head Gaels' coach Doug Hargreaves has said that his assistant

"is on the leading edge of football technology."

Perhaps the high point in Mullen's coaching career to date came in the 1992 Vanier Cup, when the Gaels shut out the St. Mary's Huskies, the heavily favoured, unbeaten and #1 ranked team in the country, 31-0 in the championship game. That was as near to a perfectly coached and executed game as one is likely to see. In three of the Gaels' final five 1992 games, Mullen's defense held ranked opponents without a touchdown.

Mullen played for the Gaels from 1977-80, and was a member of the 1978 Vanier Cup championship team that went 10-0. Defensive back was his normal position. But for several games during that 1978 season, Mullen filled in at quarterback, as one after another of the team's regular quarterbacks were felled by injury. Paced by their overwhelming defense, the Gaels didn't miss a beat.

Carlito's Way
Directed by Brian De Palma
Cataract Cineplex
BY CHRISTOPHER ZABEL
The Queen's Journal

Bad hair is something that we have to live with every day because it seems that hair spray is more addictive than cocaine. Cool people have bad hair too. Some people can't help it due to the hard facts of masculinity. Think of Woody Allen, Gene Hackman, and Nick Cage, who all have very questionable hair, but it isn't their fault. But I do have a problem with cool people who have bad hair on purpose. Think back to Presumed Innocent. Mr. Ford, sir, you weren't wearing a toga. Think about Kevin Costner in The Bodyguard (or if you're above that sort of thing, think about those Whitney Houston videos). Is there a grassroots movement developing around J. Claudius?

Now to Sean Penn in Carlito's Way (see photograph). I'm sorry, but I'm confused. I'm leafing through the press kit with my associate Pauli and I ask, "I wonder where the pictures of Sean Penn are?" "Right there." "Where?" "Right there." "That's not Sean Penn." "Yes it is." "No it isn't." "Yes it is." "Oh my goodness." I can appreciate a method actor really getting into a part (get it? Art art) but isn't this the guy who would duke it with someone for looking at him funny? Is this the guy who locked Madonna in the closet? Hair isn't a right — it's a privilege (thank you Principal Skinner).

However, as far as Pacino is concerned, just say the name and I'm there. You can't see Scarface (also directed by De Palma) and not realize that you'd probably pay eight dollars to watch him read the phone book. Still, after one's enthusiasm leads to Cruising, Revolution and Sea of Love...well, one has doubts. Now, however, the great one has hit his stride, has found his rhythm, is in his groove. Scent of a Woman, Glengarry Glen Ross, and now Carlito's Way — the man can do no wrong.

Carlito Brigante, former wise guy, has just got out of jail with the help of his long-time shifty-eyed lawyer friend David Kleinfield (Penn) and he wants to leave his old life behind. The catch is that he has to get $75,000 together before he can sail off to Barbados and buy into the car rental game with an old prison chum. All he has to do is stay alive while he makes money off of his nightclub and wins back his old girlfriend (Penelope Ann Miller).

However, because this is a movie, he can barely get through the day without having to kill somebody. (Gee, sounds like Pacino in Godfather III. "Just when I thought I was out, they pulled me back in.") The ensuing gun play really pushes the envelope, taking part in the new breed of cinematic killing that has the strange capacity to make even the hardcore desensitized ease grow goose pimples. And not only that, but the scenes of suspense are so keen that you shave your legs (and yes, I'm smooth and silky). I can't say enough — it invaded my soul.

The basic idea has to do with loyalty to the nightmare of your choice. Carlito is dedicated to the old world school of gangstering, which values loyalty, trust and honour. This line of morality develops into a tragic flaw because no one else really gives a sht. In this sense, I don't feel pretentious in raising this movie to modern mythology. I couldn't even get anyone to go see this movie with me and it was movie-night (Tuesday). Don't tell me that movies don't constitute the modern religion. If people want to realize that we don't really care apart from movie quotes and nonsense they'd realize the degeneracy of doing homework when it's Paolo who has the answers.

It is also important to note that this movie is part of the 70s culture revival that made its presence known in Reservoir Dogs, Misconduct, Donna videos and the super-cool stylings of Urge Overkill. My theory is this: we were raised in the 70s and have been unconsciously prejudiced against them. Why? Mrs. Brady on Dave's World this week, and what is Marsha doing on Herman's Head? It's beyond our control. Throughout the 80s, the 70s were a bad joke because teenage opinions were still susceptible to then-fashionable shades of coolness (new wave?). Now, however, in our early twenties, we've acquired a level of consciousness that sees through current modes of self-definition (grunge?) and we are left with our pre-defined unconscious selves which are riddled with large collars and disco. The movie didn't have to be set in 1978. I feel sort of manipulated.

If I made fun of Sean Penn earlier, I didn't really mean it. He's amazing. And Penelope Ann Miller, apart from looking great, is quite touching in her white love for our hero. Everyone should see this movie. People who don't want to should be forced to watch and chained to their seats if necessary. I'm seriously considering getting a perm this weekend.

A farcical Holmes and the search for a home

Studio 102 productions showcase student talent

Happiness Isn't A Warm Puppy / Our Little Country
Directed by Paul Eros/Tracy Williams
Studio 102
BY KIRSTY LEWIS
The Queen's Journal

I just don't enjoy stupid slapstickish Airplane type humour. There is the odd moment when my amusement level may produce a smirk, but they are very few. It's not because I'm such a tight ass that I don't appreciate anything but 'ligh' wit. I just can't see any imagination in it. Well, now that you know my own bias, I'll plunge into the opening play at this past Wednesday's Studio 102 performance at Theological Hall (which plays tonight as well). If you don't know already, Studio 102 is a chance for Drama honours students to present their theses to a real live audience. I'll try to be a fair marker.

Happiness Isn't A Warm Puppy is a Sherlock Holmes Misadventure where Dr. Watson is a Ms... Sherlock Holmes has the equivalent wit of Lieutenant Frank Drebin of the Naked Gun and Sir Baskervilles is a beer-guzzling, straight Canadian patriot whose Kodiaks never leave his side. While this play does have its few moments, including on-going doggy humour (dogmatic at times—sorry I couldn't resist) there are numerous guidelineless jokes pertaining to the recent Canadian election that are seemingly written into the script with very little subtlety or tact. But mindless humour is certainly an inherited taste and it seemed that there were many in the audience who had the right kind of genes.

Furthermore, while the constant narration by Dr. Watson clarifies the plot, it does too good a job and becomes annoying, breaking up any flow.

The next play was entitled Our Little Country and was certainly the opposite of the campiness of the Sherlock piece. Our Little Country refers to two people's attempt to escape from the brutality of modern city life by living in isolation and insulating themselves with each other's love. The story centres around a very poor pregnant couple who live in an alleyway at the very edge of urban decay. The play is successful in keeping the audience's attention by only slowly revealing the criminal intentions of their neighbours. The acting is particularly noteworthy. Conrad and Dwight, played by Alicia Francis and Zakeana Reid respectively, are a little boy talking to a man on a less urban landlords. The play ends on a very down note as the father-to-be gets stabbed, leaving his wife friend to fend for herself and the unborn baby at the mercy of Dwight and Conrad. It is too bad that Studio 102 plays have such a short time limit because this play could have been easily spread over a couple of longer acts. But no matter, the play is long enough to prove that happiness isn't found in our little country.

Hardworking Engines lack something "more"

13 Engines/Shermans
A.J.'s Hangar
BY SARAH ENGLISH
The Queen's Journal

Since 13 Engines are a band well on their way to becoming a Canadian institution, I was more than happy to accept the chance to review the first night of their two-night stand at A.J.'s this past Friday, and see what the hype was all about.

The bar was fairly full early on the night, and by the time the opening band was ready to go on, the place had filled up with regulars and an abnormally large amount of alterna-types.

The Shermans assumed the stage and quickly re-affirmed my faith in what may be Kingston's most sonically brilliant band. The first gig this band played sent me home in tears — it was terribly good for a band who had been together for a matter of weeks. Subsequent shows did not disappoint. I hadn't seen the Shermans for quite a while, and although I still considered them among the best, the sheer impact of their performance had begun to wear off a little. This quickly changed.

Barrelling through their set, The Shermans spit out heavily distorted and original guitar, driving bass lines, solid drumming and raspy vocals which made me wonder if the vocalist happened to be Kim

The Engines stop to sweat in Kingston

Tricia Bauman

Gordon's younger brother. Tracks that stood out were "Lillian Lloyd" and the "Keeping Linus Happy," which includes a riff from the Peanuts cartoon. The only flaw in their performance was their abrupt end of set — some misunderstanding resulted in their set being cut off before they had a chance to play some of their newer songs.

13 Engines soon took the stage and packed the dance floor. The band are a hard working group from the Toronto area, and are currently on tour supporting their latest album, Perpetual Motion Machine. The album is fourteen songs of solid, grungy songs written in that comfortable, easy-to-dance-to tempo. They are well known for their live performances, and I could see why.

The entire performance (2 sets) was very tight. Their extensive touring has obviously paid off, as they were very together and relaxed. The songs were filled with angry sections of noise separated by melodic guitar lines and rhythmic contemplations. Their well-crafted and noisy songs easily pleased the audience, and the dance floor remained packed all night.

The band seemed to be very serious about their show, which was both good and bad. It was nice to see a band who are intent on pleasing the audience and performing well, but at the same time, I wondered how much fun the tour had left in it. Music is for enjoyment, and I wasn't sure that they were happy to be playing the show, or whether it was simply a part of their careers that had to be dealt with.

Unfortunately, although the musicianship, song structure and content and overall attitude were excellent, I found myself wondering why 13 Engines are different than any other rock band. "Derivative" is the word which comes to mind. "I fell something inside and it wants to get out" they tell us in their first single, "More". This would be the perfect song to let loose and let it all out, so to say, but the song still seems to be restrained and chained back, leaving you wanting...more. They have followed the formula for success, and will no doubt become a member of Canada's pride and joy. But what makes them special? Perhaps this question is irrelevant, but it bothers me nonetheless. 13 Engines made for a good night, and I'm sure all left the bar feeling rather pleasant and appeased. Since you can't make everyone ecstatically happy, this is a pretty commendable feat, and they deserve credit for this. And given a second chance, I'll probably go check them out next time they are through town.

As for The Shermans, well, they rock the world.

A month of Sundays (well, nearly)

Trio of short films offers something for everyone

Especially on Sunday
Directed by Giuseppe Tornatore, Giuseppe Bertolucci, and Marco Tullio Giordana
Princess Court Cinema
BY OWIN LAMBECK
The Queen's Journal

Especially on Sunday, a collage of related Italian short films, is an intriguing study of human behaviour. There are several common threads running through the stories, although they are for the most part independent of each other. All are the work of screenwriter Tonino Guerra, all are scored by the renowned Ennio Morricone, and all put interesting characters into unique situations. The film as a whole is comprised of three half-hour episodes: The Blue Dog, directed by Giuseppe Tornatore (of Cinema Paradiso fame); Especially on Sunday, directed by Giuseppe Bertolucci; and Snow on Fire, directed by Marco Tullio Giordana.

Before the stories begin, the film opens with a cryptic scene of a little boy talking to a man on a motorcycle. Through a confusing over narration, we learn that these are all stories of the Marechia Valley, which reveal the "beauty in the landscape and the strong emotions of the people who live there." This scene probably holds some deep hidden meaning about the significance of the stories told, but it isn't easy to pick up. Also problematic is the fact that the original film had four segments, not three, one being cut out of the Canadian release. These factors make it difficult to consider the film as one cohesive work. Luckily, this doesn't matter too much, as the stories are all highly enjoyable on their own.

The Blue Dog is the segment that I thought worked best. It is the story of a cranky barber, Amelto (Phillippe Noiret) who is being constantly pestered by a small brown dog with a blue spot on its head. Although he keeps denying any affiliation with the poor mutt, the dog keeps getting him into all kinds of trouble, from knocking over a midget to running with scissors. Finally, Amelto takes drastic measures and gets rid of the dog. It is hard to find much sympathy for this non-dog lover, but he redeems himself when he finds that he misses the dog so much that he goes wandering around the countryside to find it. Noiret is the marvellous rumpled French actor who stole the show in Cinema Paradiso and countless other films, including this one. The Blue Dog is at times hilarious and at other times heartbreaking, but it will leave you smiling at the end.

The second part, Especially on Sunday, leaves sentimental dog well-defined in this segment, but that does not diminish the constant tension as Marco keeps interrupting Vittorio's attempts at seduction.

The third instalment, Snow on Fire, is another complex look at the motives behind human behaviour. It involves a widow, Caterina (Maria Maddalena Fellini, sister of the recently-deceased director), who accidentally finds that, by loosening a brick, she can watch her son and his new bride making love. At one point the young woman looks up and sees that she is being watched. This creates complex relationships between the two women and between each woman and the local priest, who hears their confessions. Although, like Especially on Sunday, the action involves some fairly explicit sex scenes, here the focus is not upon desire, but guilt.

All of the stories included in Especially on Sunday are compelling, well-written and entertaining. Each of the directors also has a wonderful visual sense, with beautiful cinematography and many clever visual devices. In The Blue Dog, for instance, Amelto is being chased by the dog, and as he passes a wall his shadow is small and the dog's is gigantic. But despite the visual mastery and juicy sex scenes that the films contain, it is the stories and characters that really make Especially on Sunday a wonderful viewing experience.

Lake Sheffield Days

Sheffield Lake '93
Agnes Elherington Art Centre
BY MIKE MOSS
The Queen's Journal

Artists are strange birds and one ought not be surprised at the peculiarities that arise when they flock together. Take for example the exhibit currently on display at the Agnes, Sheffield Lake '93, the product of a week-long eclectic gathering of eight female artists from Ontario, Quebec, and New York in a remote eastern Ontario setting. For six working days, Sheffield Lake uproots the studio from the city (many participants are city dwellers) and plants it down in a quiet lakeside retreat where the artists are, said organizer Milly Risvedt, "free from the distractions of daily life." Which is no guarantee that art in the country is easier to create or better than its metropolitan sister; rather, said Risvedt, "it is about an experience."

The communal living situation (four two-bedroom cottages) requires that artistic temperaments remain somewhat compatible (strange when you think about it: on the one hand, a communion with nature stems from a desire "to get away" from everyone else, yet at the same time, due to restricted living quarters, there exists an enforced closeness). An abundance of snapshots showing the artists enjoying themselves and each other testifies to their congeniality.

Michele Drouin said of her getaway at Sheffield Lake, "it can't escape being a feminist statement." I guess when an exclusively female group goes about doing anything adhesive gender labels will invariably stick; however, what is really important (because art is not a gender issue, but a matter of truth and the spirit) is that creative individuals have a means and a place of congregating. Milly Risvedt aptly dubbed it "a positive experience for people who spend most of their time talking to themselves."

The gas flame of inspiration seems to have been burning for all eight artists whose hanging works present a variety of styles. Each artist seems to have contributed a personal gem lovingly crafted in a tender, happy environment. Jerry Grey's soft landscapes, The Green Line and A Far Shore treat the viewer to a wonderful wash of colours which captures the essence of an idyllic sanctuary. Also light and airy are Kate Graham's Outline Drawings of Participants, quick sketches of the artists at work and at rest. Graham is paid homage to in Kate's Spirit, a bright vertical splash of hot and cold tones by Michele Drouin as she celebrates Graham's renown with colour. Perhaps the most effusive painting is Risvedt's Blue Moon, a grid painting controlled by oranges and blues, but also an intimate confession of Sheffield Lake's singular attraction.

And yet to speak of all this healthy togetherness... what about the canker of ineptitude? Sheffield Lake seems to have run smoothly, but what if it didn't? What if even one artist was so utterly paralysed with creative insensibility that the innocent act of saying, "Gee, that's pretty good" about the work of another was hell? That would make for a great story. The sound of the loons in the dark by the lake would not be so comforting then.

Virtuoso siblings dazzle

Corey and Katja Cerovsek
Grant Hall
BY FIONA VANCE
The Queen's Journal

Very few people were left breathing normally after Sunday afternoon's electrifying concert featuring Corey and Katja Cerovsek. The sibling duo, on violin and piano respectively, offered the audience a dazzling mélange of repertoire brought to life by their incredible technique and musicality.

Corey Cerovsek was undeniably the focus of the concert, devouring all selections but one. The sheer personality of his stage presence revealed him as the consummate showman, with eyes half-closed, a smile playing about his mouth, and violin presented in a generous giving motion. He was comfortable at all parts of the fingerboard (even at parts not on the fingerboard), and he pushed tempi and note-per-second density to unbelievable limits. He had extreme tension in his right wrist and fingers, which normally hinders bowing facility, yet his bow work was phenomenally dextrous and his vigour belied itself in the form of numerous broken bow-hairs.

As the program unfolded, this extraordinary violinist glittered, soared, danced, and seduced his way to the pith of the audience's imagination. Kreisler's short Variations on a Theme by Corelli was played with confident strides of the bow in the theme segment that embraced a lively central section. The intensely beautiful Fantasy in C major by Schubert followed, the first ethereal Andante displaying Cerovsek's acute bow control, then some frolicsome pizzicato during the variational development and a darker, wiser recapitulation at the finish. The famously discordant music of Bartok's Rhapsody No. 1 brought the first half of the program to a close. Cerovsek played the tricky octaves unflinchingly, while convincing the audience's ear of the open string harmonies and the muted section of the Rhapsody.

After intermission, Katja Cerovsek astounded the already-dazed audience with her exquisite solo of Ravel's La Valse. With a rumbling bass line in the left hand and the hint of a Strauss-ish waltz in the right, the mixture of major concord and minor discord created a compelling duality in the piece. In spite of some muddiness in the rolling bass, her technique was otherwise precise and her glissandos were thrilling.

I was heartily sceptical of Corey Cerovsek's remark that his sister was "a hard act to follow" and my scepticism was upheld by his rendition of the next three short pieces: Bloch's Vidui, Hubay's Zephyr, and Wieniawski's Variations on an Original Theme. After the slow, plaintive Bloch, the final two pieces were showy and virtuosic, complete with drop piccato, harmonics, and lefthand pizzicato. The Wieniawski was one gigantic cadenza and by the end, I myself was exhausted. The violinist missed intonation about four notes, but four out of five million isn't bad!

The entire performance was practically flawless, seemingly effortless, and completely diverting. Katja Cerovsek is a sensitive accompanist and she solidly supported her brother's violin antics. Grant Hall was nearly full for this incredible concert which was recorded by CBC's Arts National. And, as if the program were not enough, the Cerovseks responded to a standing ovation with encores, Sarasate's Introduction and Tarantella and Kreisler's Le Timbre chinois. The Cerovseks temporarily knocked the breath and remaining sanity out of my system, so profoundly spectacular was their performance. I know that audiences everywhere will continue to be seduced by the siblings and aspiring musicians will alternately be inspired and depressed. In fact, I used to consider myself a not-too-shabby violinist, but on Sunday afternoon I wondered if I wouldn't be sacrilegious for me to pick up the instrument ever again.

No Seventh Heaven

Seven
The Caribbean
BY HOR JUNYK
The Queen's Journal

It's difficult for me to do this review. It's difficult because on one hand the critical side of me demands that I assassinate this band. On the other hand, the side of me that has appeared with various non-descript bands demands that I give these guys a certain amount of credit.

After seeing a considerable number of shows and doing a certain amount of performing, I've come to the conclusion that you can pretty well evaluate a band from the sound check. The more ornate and baroque a band is while setting levels, the worse they seem to fare while performing live. Much to my horror, Seven played into every Spinal Tap-ian excess imaginable.

At worst, Seven reminded me of the following scenario: A band appears on stage. The first distorted chords of "Smoke on the Water" blast through the speakers. The drunken audience goes crazy. It's the apothecosis of the high school battle of the bands scenario. This is the worst aspect of Seven. At their worst they are a pretentious, overbearing unit, aspiring to Soundgarden, Cult, and early Black Sabbath status. They are a step removed from battle of the bands posers doing Steppenwolf covers. Consider the following lyrics: When I'm outside I want it to rain / But when I'm inside I show the pain. Really, I find it difficult to think of anything more horrible than that.

Unfortunately, they aren't so easy to dismiss. Although they tend to deal in cliché and stereotype, they have too much talent to be dismissed out of hand. As a band they are tight and as individual players they show a lot of promise. The drummer and bass player lay down a solid groove on top of which the two guitarists layered textures. The lead singer left something to be desired but the audience didn't seem to mind. Likewise, they ignored the subtle problems in the sound mix and responded enthusiastically to the show in general.

Not in Seventh Heaven

Derek Yarnell

Ultimately, when it comes down to it, the main thing you can say about Seven is that they are a young band. At least Seven hasn't started too late. They have plenty of time to mature and develop as a band. They have time to lose the clichés and stereotypes and establish their own material and stage presence.

As they stand now Seven is a derivative high school wanna-be band, but they have the potential to develop into something original and interesting. I can't recommend seeing Seven right now, but I also can't recommend writing them off. Knows, in a few years they might amount to something.

Another fix for Junkies

Pale Sun, Crescent Moon
Cowboy Junkies
BMG
BY JAMES KEAST
The Queen's Journal

Cowboy Junkies is a band that have been hijacked by their own success. Their path to stardom, slow, steady, gaining more attention and attracting bigger crowds to club tours across Canada, finally having a big breakthrough after five or six years and getting all the respect they've deserved after all these years was horribly, tragically interrupted by one single day.

On that single day, Margo, Michael, and Peter Timmins and Alan Anton headed down to a church in Toronto with the four-track they had rented and fifty bucks for pizza to lay down some album tracks. Not much different from their previous independent release, recorded in the Timmins' family garage, this album was to be a simple, straightforward recording. Except that in 14 hours, Cowboy Junkies gave birth to a multi-headed hydra that has haunted them ever since. That monster, in whose shadow they have lived ever since, was called The Trinity Sessions and quickly brought them more fame and fortune than they ever dreamt possible, and, in retrospect, more than they probably ever wanted.

In the space of a couple more albums, their star had risen, and been eclipsed by other rising stars. Their style had been analyzed, emulated, copied, and dismissed. After three albums, not even puberty in the music industry, their sound had already been dismissed as "all the same."

So now, the quartet has to start again, exorcising ghosts, changing impressions, fighting the musical juggernaut that they created for themselves.

Sure, things are easier; they have support that previous albums never received - they have major backing from a big studio, a reputation and following already established, a plush holiday season release that only big names get.

But musically, Pale Sun, Crescent Moon is about starting the cycle over again. It's about looking at who this band is, and where they want to go. Five albums is right in the middle between one-hit-wonder and established artist. The Beatles made sixteen albums before they made Sgt. Pepper's. The Junkies are just beginning to hit their stride.

The new album is another step in their musical evolution. Gone is the wispy rasp that was Margo Timmins' voice on previous albums, and here (hopefully to stay) is a sultry rasp that sometimes bursts in territory inhabited by the likes of Bessie Smith, Aretha Franklin, and Janis Joplin. Still present are the slow subdued chords of Michael Timmins' guitar work, but even better is the blues wail of guest lead guitarist Ken Myhr. Also back is the poly-instrumentalist Jeff Bird who adds incredible texture on harmonica, mandolin, bass and miscellaneous percussion. Richard Bell also guests on piano and organ.

The first tune, "Crescent Moon," was inspired by the work of blues writer/friend Townes Van Zandt, who has written for the band before and shared part of the last tour with them. Michael's lyrics balance the personal pain and sharing of earlier songs like "Sun Comes Up (It's Tuesday Morning)," but add spacious imagery that recalls empty nights full of promise. Now cast your eyes to a part of the sky where nothing but darkness unfolds/stand watch as all around you she reveals the brilliance of secrets untold.

"First Recollection" is a hard-driving blues tune that draws from the work of William Faulkner to tell a tale of passing seasons, and the reflections that come with the passing of time.

The details of life are what Michael Timmins captures so well in his lyrics, the small events that ring so true to the listener - taking a wedding ring off to do dishes in "Ring On The Sill"; or I don't like the way his pink ring/picks up the dashboard light in "Floorboard Blues."

Time passes in little moments, and you can either enjoy them as you go by, or rush past, in too much of a hurry to appreciate the world around you. Speed breeds regret is the message that these songs are passing on to their audience. Have you ever had the pleasure of watching a quiet winter's snow slowly gathering/like simple moments adding up. But life is to be lived, not to be pined away, since "memories are just dead men making trouble," a line lifted from Gabriel Garcia Marquez.

The Junkies have always had excellent success reinterpreting other people's material, from the almost all-cover album Whites Off Earth Now to Lou Reed's "Sweet Jane" (Trinity Session) and Neil Young's "Powderfinger" (The Cantion Horses) but this album's famous cover may surprise you. Although I doubt you'll see them flaunting the grunge look on their upcoming tour, they take on Dinosaur Jr. by doing a version of "The Post." While many people jumped on the bandwagon with The Trinity Sessions, others abandoned ship as the quartet went through some much needed (and musically interesting) transition/growth phases. But with their new album, Cowboy Junkies are pushing the boundaries in ways that are sure to bring some of those people back to the fold. Pale Sun, Crescent Moon is in a lot of ways their strongest work so far.

The Cowboy Junkies are playing live in Toronto on Friday December 3rd at the Mocambo. Although there is no Kingsdate, there will be an album release party next Thursday at Windmills Cafe. Autographed CD's and posters will be on hand for giveaway.

Big Star
Columbia/Live at Missouri
University 4/25/93
Zoo/BMG Records
BY CHRISTIAN deBRUIJN
The Queen's Journal

Jeez... where can you start to describe a band like Big Star and the effect they've had. Well, here's an attempt: they are the missing link between The Beatles and The Replacements, The Velvet Underground of the 1970's and the basis for post-punk power pop. The huge list of artists that cite Big Star as a major influence include R.E.M., the dB's, Matthew Sweet, The Posies, The Bangles, Let's Active and Teenage Fanclub.

Big Star formed in Memphis during mid-1971 and put out the now legendary and ironically titled #1 Record. The sound of the band could be described as The Beatles/Byrds/Kinks all meshed together into a unique blend that is described as "pop n'roll." The line-up featured Alex Chilton on guitars/vocals (you know, the guy who wrote the 1967 number one smash "The Letter" with The Box Tops when he was 16), Chris Bell on guitars/vocals, Andy Hummel on bass/vocals and Jody Stephens on drums. Despite the presence of a pop star like Chilton, the record, which had critics raving, nonetheless ended up as a commercial bomb due to lack of support from their record company. Bell subsequently left the group, due to the lack of success and his own desire to pursue a solo career. The remainder of the band stayed on to put out Radio City in 1973, which became yet another critical masterpiece and commercial failure. After this final disappointment, the band broke up.

Chilton, refusing to give up, attempted to portray the time

Mousketeers indeed!

Another weak remake of a classic

The Three Musketeers
Directed by Stephen Herek
Capitol Theatre
BY DAVID ULLMANN
The Queen's Journal

Who's the leader of the band, a friend to you and me? M-I-C-K-E-Y D'-A-R-T-A-G-N-A-N-O-K, so there are too many letters and it doesn't quite rhyme, but Walt's dead, so who cares.

Not Walt Disney Studios, who have embarked on retelling the classic tale of all for one and one for all. The not-so-tired story of The Three Musketeers (actually, there are four - old joke, but check the material I have to work with) is once again re-enacted with some star power, a few laughs and Rebecca DeMornay thrown in to boot. (Oh boy!) Not a bad story for a picture anyway.

The story revolves around three plots. The evil and duplicitous Cardinal Richelieu is in the process of usurping the King (Louis XIII?); a young D'Artagnan has set off to Paris to join the club; and the three musketeers are struggling to have the newly disbanded musketeers reassembled. Eventually D'Artagnan is united with the wayward musketeers, the Cardinal feels his neck and the disbanded musketeers begin to stir. Slowly the plots are woven together like some kind of Renaissance tapestry until a colourful conclusion and a few tassels finish it off.

Attempts to portray the time period are relatively accurate; the uniforms are well designed and the swords look appropriate. Little details like the musket mounts betray the attempts to get things right. The only flaws stem from the fact that the people on the whole are too clean and the sword-play suffers from the typical faults that offend fencing aficionados, well choreographed but a little too flamboyant.

The musketeers are played by an intense Kiefer Sutherland (more beard than man), a confused Charlie Sheen, (is there any other kind?) and a portly Oliver Platt (who is condemned to a bad hair statement but gets the best of the jokes). The young D'Artagnan is played by the cute Chris O'Donnell, still smelling from last year's Scent of a Woman. They all make cute Disney cut-outs, but I still would have preferred Donald and Mickey.

Rebecca DeMornay plays a wayward mistress who represents the love interest for the film. This plotline is somewhat flat although it does, at one point, seem to promise a gruesome decapitation, definitely a Disney first. DeMornay's best lines are sacrificed to the trailer making her performance in the film otherwise unremarkable.

However, much can be said about Tim Curry, who plays the nefarious Cardinal Richelieu. He is sly but not slimy, somewhat like Kaa from The Jungle Book. He glides about the room in his floor-length ecclesiastical red velvet. (He might have been wearing his fishnets and garters underneath, but because this is a kids' movie we never find out.) The way he slithers up to Gabriella Anwar as she comes out of the bath is memorable to say the least. Walt would not have approved.

To mention other anti-Disney aspects, there are moments that are surprisingly dark. In particular, there is an opening scene in a dungeon full of screaming medieval torture devices and one person being energetically whipped by some Doctor Who reject. The manacled victim is eventually stabbed to death, after Cardinal Richelieu pretends to grant him a reprieve. Now I might be making a mountain out of molehills, but while I know the bad guys have to be established as bad, couldn't it be done without scaring the five-year-olds who will certainly attend the film? Well maybe this is just my axe to grind, but can't Michael Eisner make kids movies that are for kids?

This is not to say that this film is purely the preserve of the underdog generation. It's a fun Tuesday kind of movie, although the occasional cheesy moment, particularly the last, will make you cringe. "All for one and one" will cost you eight dollars. Not bad, but not great.

Twinkle, twinkle Big Star

went on to record his melancholy and heart-break opus, Big Star Third/Sister Lovers in 1975.

After persuasive lobbying, Ken Stringfellow and Jonathan Auer from The Posies were brought in for this gig to replace the deceased Bell and aerospace engineer Hummel. The selection of songs (mostly from #1 Record and Radio City) and vocalists on Columbia demonstrates Chilton's lack of ego and his desire to make this a true band effort. Both Stringfellow and Auer sang lead on several tracks and the band played a version of Hummel's "Way Out West" and Stephens' "For You," featuring Stephens on vocals. The choice of covers is interesting, with T-Rex's moody "Baby Strange" and a great rendition of Todd Rudgren's sex cheer, "Star" added to the play list. The highlights of Columbia have to be Chilton's rendition of the affectionately cynically "Thank You Friends" and "When My Baby's Beside Me," with its three minutes and 27 seconds of pure guitar pop bliss. The most striking thing that will hit the listener about Columbia, or any other Big Star record, is that despite the songs being 20 years old, they sound just as, or even more, fresh and innovative as anything done in the post-punk power pop genre.

The problem with Columbia is that it would have been interesting to hear more than the two songs chosen from Big Star Third/Sister Lovers: "Thank You Friends" & "For You" on the album. To see what this band could have done live with "Jesus Christ" or "Holocaust", with Chilton's desolate voice and guitar, would be worth the price of the recording alone. Big Star should have also attempted some of their own versions of "Femme Fatal" or "Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On," instead of the covers chosen. Oh well...I'm being picky. For those so-called purists who cry "sell out," get real. Chilton for twenty years has refused to cash in on the Big Star name, instead opting to do annual reunion tours with the Box Tops. The rumours of a fourth Big Star studio album are over-exaggerated. The September Boys wouldn't let us down. To sum this all up, remember what The Replacements' Paul Westerberg says in his all-time fan song "Alex Chilton": I never travel far I Without a little Big Star.

Sensation SEXUALITY

MISC: Not for the squeamish!

The forgotten side of Body Art

In the October 15th issue of the Journal was a story on navel piercing. This is an artistic view on body art.

Pop culture has recently acquired a profound interest in the "lost" tradition of body art. But this new interest, focused primarily on the aesthetic of the end product — how one's new piercing or tattoo — negates much of my understanding of the art. I feel that perhaps the ritual, sexual and emotional aspects of experience are being negated by the own personal iconography. It is easier to access scarification in a National Geographic than to see it on someone on campus.

I've decided to get work done in the past to either commemorate an important event in my life or because an image has personal importance to me. On one occasion I treated myself to a piercing as a birthday present to myself. By putting an equal emphasis on the preliminary processes of decision, placement, and preliminary cleaning as I did on the piercing itself,

As body art has become increasingly popular, I've found myself more and more disillusioned with its representation in the media. Here images of piercing and tattooing are re-presented to us in the forms of sexy girls in Aerosmith videos, anorexic models posing as George Michael. These are disappointing images which are being given a way of expression that centuries and in a multitude of cultures has given people a tool to explore their identities, their spirituality and their sexuality.

There are many sensations a person gets when they pierce or tattoo. It is not only subjective and very dependent on the person's state of mind, but some find it to be a definite sexual experience. If we look at the sensations one feels in the piercing parlour or the piercing studio, we can see that there is the anticipation of the pain, the tension during the procedure and an eventual release. Thus the event becomes more than just a physical one; it becomes cathartic — a good, learning experience — if you allow yourself to feel it and react to it.

For those of you who are still in doubt, like to bring you back to junior high (or maybe last night for some) and cite the same purple example better known as "hickies" to demonstrate the potential pleasurable aspects of branding or tattooing. Since hickies presumably occur in the heat of the moment, what would normally be considered to be in the realm of the painful suddenly becomes pleasurable as a part of the sexual experience. Hence, a person in the proper state of mind, a piercing or branding can be just a sexual experience as intercourse.

There is also a strong element of ritual in body art. There is process, with each part emotional and physical context. In university we study cultures different from our own and recognize their rites of passage and rituals as significant and legitimate. Things like lifting weights, cooking — the things we do everyday — are all sense rituals which inscribe who we are. Body art is a solidification and statement of the greater currents in our lives of such these smaller things are just a part. It seems strange that we turn to other cultures symbols and don't acknowledge our

Maybe the emphasis on aesthetics instead of sensation is derived from our societies obsession with nubile forms adorning themselves to please the eye. The elasticity of a tattoo with aging, the stretching of a piercing as a result of weight or a larger gauge, or the changing of a branding scar with the passing of time, these should all be seen as attractive because they're an expression of someone's personality and sexuality through their body. The one thing we have total control over and can use as a means to enjoy sensation and record our history.

When I began working for the studio experience not just for me, but for the many others who have had work done to them in the studio where I work and abroad. Obviously some people will prefer certain forms of body art to others, and some can find their physical and emotional outlets elsewhere. But what is important is that we all recognize the necessity for these outlets and the ubiquitous presence of rituals in our lives.

If you decide that body art is something you want to explore, the most important thing that I can stress is safety. It's important to ask questions about the work your're having done. Ask to see a portfolio as if the artist doesn't have one, it could be an indication that your're one of their first clients — or that they haven't been very successful. While body painting is accessible to all, the more precise arts of scarification and tattooing I've described require proper training and should not be attempted by amateurs. Make sure you chose a studio that provides for all of the above and who can also give you concise rules of after care and enforced sterilization.

Majority of people I've met through the studio use body modification to celebrate their life. It's common for people to use piercings as a marriage bond and an experience to go through together. As a whole, the people who are involved at the studio consider themselves a community or a tribe. Our tattoos, scars and piercings identify us as having some collective knowledge of each other and our experiences. By making the experience our own, and respecting our bodies we can celebrate our sexuality in a forum that doesn't dictate how much we're supposed to weigh or how much make-up we should wear. To me this is the true freedom of expression and shouldn't be considered a trivial fad to please the people around me.

Body Art can be used to mark significant events or as a method of personal expression. Photos courtesy of Janet, the author.

I enjoyed the experience far more than I would have otherwise and felt an immense release when the process was completed.

For the event in question, I surrounded myself with familiar people, music and settings and as a result, I became so caught up in my state of mind that I didn't feel the needle passing through my flesh. Obviously not everyone can have such an experience as most people have to go to a studio and may not know the people performing the procedure, but they can still do the best they can. I don't understand why people settle for less, as I can't see the motivation to do something for your body unless it's completely self satisfying and comfortable.

I hope that the markings on my body act as a history book for me later, recording my losses and joys on the same canvas. There are alternatives to the more permanent practices of tattooing, piercing, branding and scarification. My friend Patricia wanted to record the stages of her pregnancy and was interested in some of the tattoos she saw at the studio where I apprentice. We decided to take all the designs she liked and paint them on her body. She photographed the process and the final design to commemorate an important stage in her life that she wanted to beautify.

my first job was to help with a branding at a benefit against censorship. I wanted to help because it's a cause I support but admittedly I found the idea of burning flesh intimidating. It was Mikey's first time getting a branding so he was a bit nervous too. The design he'd chosen was a union of the male and female gender symbols. There were only three sizes of metal to create the shapes; one v-shaped, one straight and the other slightly curved. Absolute precision is required when placing the scores and it is crucial that there is at least a centimetre between each strike since the initial burn spreads. Twenty-two strikes later (he was 22), Mikey sat up and embraced all of us involved. There was no screaming or crying, just a great physical release and gain.

From this and other experiences, I have found that body art is a spiritual and sensual

OUSA

Ontario Undergraduate Students Alliance

What is OUSA?

- A student lobbying group comprised of six Ontario university student associations; Brock University, McMaster University (part-time students), Queen's University, University of Toronto (part-time students), University of Waterloo, Wilfred Laurier University, and University of Western Ontario.

- OUSA represents students to the provincial government, and both the public and private sectors. OUSA is actively working to improve the quality of a university undergraduate education.

Why should Queen's be a member?

-Firstly, the post-secondary education system will be overhauled in the next few years. The provincial government will be reforming the university financing structure (i.e. the amount taxpayers will contribute to education), the student loans system, and tuition fee levels. OUSA provides a means by which students can participate in the discussion on these changes.

THE NEW OUSA POLICY DOCUMENT IS ENTITLED "IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST". COPIES ARE AVAILABLE FROM ACADEMIC AFFAIRS, AMS. HERE ARE SOME COMMON QUESTIONS ABOUT THE DOCUMENT:

How did this document come about?

In August 1993, college and university leaders met with the Minister of Education and Training, Dave Cooke. Cooke informed the students that he would be implementing a 'substantial' increase in tuition for 1994-95 and asked students to respond to him with the conditions under which such an increase could be the least painful and the most fair. OUSA took this opportunity for input very seriously and produced a collective response to the Minister. "In the Public Interest" is that response.

I heard tuition fees are going to go up 50%. Aren't we too late?

No. The Council of Ontario Universities (COU), in their response to Minister Cooke, proposed that tuition be increased by roughly 50% by 1995-96. The COU, albeit influential, is simply one of the interest groups responding to the minister. There has been no announcement regarding the size of the tuition increase yet.

Is the Income Contingency Loan Repayment (ICLR) plan the only form of student financial aid OUSA advocates?

No. "In the Public Interest" includes a very detailed platform for student aid reform. We propose a three-tiered system. The first tier is targeted toward low income students with little or no family support. These students would be awarded bursaries to cover their fees and books. The second tier consists of an income contingent loans program funded by the provincial and federal governments and subsidized to ease the repayment responsibilities for low-income earners. The third tier is an almost completely self-financing income contingent loans program directed toward students whose income or assets are substantial, but who also have sizable debts or responsibilities. These students would be able to borrow from the government, and repay the loan after graduation, with interest - accumulating throughout their period of study.

How realistic are our recommendations?

Some of our recommendations are very realistic -- such as the elimination of ancillary fees and a gradual reform of the student aid program. Others -- such as dollar for dollar matching funds from the government -- will be more difficult to attain.

Business faculty approves privatized MBA program

Critics fear plan is "thin edge of the wedge"

BY JEFF GRAY
The Faculty Board of the School of Business voted unanimously in support of the proposal to privatize the master's of business administration program at Queen's - and hike tuition to $20,000 - at a closed meeting on Tuesday.

This is only the first of many hurdles the proposal must clear before accepting students in May of 1996. It still has to pass through Senate in December and will face the Board of Trustees sometime in the new year.

MBA School Chairperson Ken Wong was elated with the results of the vote, but says he is worried about how the proposal is being interpreted.

Wong is concerned that the proposal is being seen as the "thin edge of the wedge" that will pave the way for other university faculties to privatize.

Ontario's two student lobby groups have come out against the proposal. Both the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance, of which Queen's is a founding member, and the Canadian Federation of Students-Ontario say they are not in favour of the privatization plan.

Alma Mater Society President Katherine Philips said she had reservations about the plan's implications.

"Privatizing the MBA program might start us on a slippery slope toward privatizing other professional programs," Philips said.

However, Wong was adamant that the MBA proposal is a one-of-a-kind situation, and not a sign of things to come for the rest of the university.

"It is important to emphasize that we are not presenting this proposal as a model for the entire university. That's not what this is all about. And frankly, if it gets billed that way, I will withdraw my personal support for it," Wong said.

Carollers ring in the holiday season at Grant Hall.

Privatization suits the MBA School perfectly, he said, because of the income potential of MBA graduates, and the possibility of receiving corporate support "without selling out academic integrity."

Wong also maintained that the new $20,000 price tag will not

Vids in the hole
Video store faces massive deficit

BY BROCK MARTLAND

Vids in the Hall is in serious trouble.

The adolescent Alma Mater Society-run video rental store is facing a deficit of about $53,000, and the possibility it will be cancelled in April.

AMS Administrative Services Director Stephanie Taylor said "grim numbers" have led the AMS Board of Directors Management Committee to consider various options for the store.

The option decided upon, she said, "basically entails revising the budget to try and reduce our costs."

Starting in January, the store will reduce its hours of operation and stock of movie titles. Vids will likely be open six hours a day rather than 10, and will lease 700 movies, rather than the current 1000.

This option will be voted on, as part of the store's budget, by the Board of Directors on Dec. 7. Taylor said she expects the board to approve it.

Additionally, lowering rental prices "is a definite option," she said.

Vids manager Susan Munro said, "it's a pretty sure bet that we're going to be changing the prices around in the winter."

At an Annual General Meeting in April, the AMS will determine whether Vids in the Hall will be kept open.

Asked if she thinks the store will survive that review, Taylor said, "it's hard to say. The only way it will survive is if we prove that the service can be viable in the long term."

Munro said she will focus on advertising and store specials "to make the store more well-known on campus."

And Megan Rock, assistant manager, said business is improving. "We're still incurring a loss, but things are getting better just with our daily sales," she said.

Taylor said the decision to open the video store - made by last year's AMS executive - was political. "This was the [old] executive's mandate; they made a promise," she said.

As such, Taylor said that for this year's AMS, "it is very much an inherited problem, in that the Board of Directors passed a motion last March that AMS would keep the service open ... until April 1994."

(Not so) Quiet Pub faces curfew
Grad residence students complain of noise

BY BROCK MARTLAND

As a result of noise complaints, the Quiet Pub has been ordered to close early - at 11 p.m. - for the remainder of 1993.

Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations) Dr. Tom Williams ordered the early closing on Tuesday, because of excessive noise affecting students living in the graduate residence above the QP.

Furthermore, Williams warned, if noise problems continue, the pub will be closed for the rest of the fall term.

His decision has provoked mixed reaction.

Quiet Pub Assistant Manager Dave Cameron called the decision "very disappointing... We're basically being punished for our location."

But Dan Hocoy, don for the graduate residence situated directly above the QP in the John Deutsch University Centre, said he was pleased, but hoped the hours would last for the rest of the academic year.

The conflict over the pub's noise levels began just after frosh week. QP management has entered into numerous agreements with Williams, but none has solved the problem. The QP most recently volunteered to shut at 11 p.m. during reading week, and to reduce capacity by 15 people, in hopes of avoiding the early shutdown before reading week.

However, Williams rejected this offer, and said an immediate move was necessary. "It's become an urgent matter because we're now into the exam period... We're at the point where we have to take some action," he said.

Hocoy agreed, saying, "especially now it's a concern... because of exams and papers."

According to Hocoy, the noise from the pub made the residence rooms "unbearable to live in. At certain times you could hear word for word every song that they played."

He said, "residents are sympathetic to the needs of the pub... But these people have a right... living arrangements have got to be conducive to studying."

Cameron questioned the graduate students' complaint. "Basically it's three or four people... and the majority of Queen's students are now affected," he said.

Hocoy said the residents did not want to be perceived as "spoilers." Instead, he said, "it's an inherently bad situation," with no particular group at fault.

Cameron said the decision "will affect our financial status because most of our patrons, especially at this time of year, patronize us after 11 p.m."

Alma Mater Society Services Director Jess Dutton said, "there's nothing we can do. We're at the mercy of the grad students." He suggested one call to security could close down the pub.

To prevent the noise problem for second term, the QP is looking into

Middle-East peace agreement questioned

Expert faults peace accord at Palestine Day forum

BY ANDREA HUNCAR
The Queen's Journal

Mohammed Al-Asi says he's swimming against the current.

The elected Imam (leader) of the Washington D.C. Islamic Centre warned Queen's students on Monday night in Dunning Auditorium before discussing the recent peace agreement in the Middle East.

"I don't think peace is achievable within the definitions outlined in the Oslo agreement and Declaration of Principals," he said.

Al-Asi, who holds degrees in Arabic language, Islamic studies, government, politics and education, has recently been involved in numerous meetings, lectures and seminars regarding the Jericho-Gaza Agreement between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Last month he met with the political advisor for PLO leader Yasser Arafat, and also conducted interviews for the BBC in Arabic and English regarding the Boston issue.

"There is a peace process in the Middle East," Al-Asi said. It is endorsed by the Middle East governments, the European Community, the United States, the oil-rich states, the industrial states and everyone else... and it is only a matter of time before we have the peace."

In spite of this, Al-Asi said, the repercussions of this accord would "ultimately bring an upsurge in instability, soon."

Al-Asi presented evidence that while there is a diversity of views, there is one point on which many Arabs and Israelis agree — that the accord is not viable.

He noted that "the religious composition is very strong on both sides. You can't convince a devout Jew or a devout Muslim that religion has nothing to do with this."

Vids hours and movies cut

Taylor expressed amazement at the lack of research prior to opening the store. "I really can't believe that it was done... In terms of the actual planning, the actual research that was done, there's pretty much one or two sheets of paper. [It was] a very minimal feasibility study."

Last year's AMS Vice-President (Operations) Jason Thompson "never presented a spreadsheet or a whole project idea to Assembly," Taylor charged.

The thinking at the time, she said, was "to break even, we would need to rent 14 movies a day. But that is just not the case."

Munro said she is "mad at them for not doing proper research, because it's made our job a lot tougher."

The Management Committee, a sub-committee under the Board of Directors, considered other options for the store.

First, Taylor said, the committee looked at "keeping the store as is, maintaining the exact [current] operating hours, and not altering our movie stock." This would result in a deficit of $60,492.

The committee also considered closing immediately. "But once we plugged those numbers into a spreadsheet, we realized that closing the store and having zero revenue would in fact result in a greater deficit [a deficit of $59,108] than keeping the store open with reduced costs."

This is because the store is tied into office space and movie lease contracts, Taylor said.

The Queen's Journal

This past weekend, Queen's campus played host to a coalition of lesbian and gay rights activists, who are working for the recognition of same-sex couples.

The Lesbian and Gay Association of Kingston hosted a meeting of the Steering Committee of the Coalition for Lesbian and Gay Rights in Ontario. About a dozen members of CLGRO gathered in the John Orr Room on Saturday and Sunday in the quarterly meeting of the Steering Committee. The group consists of numerous member groups across the province.

Representatives discussed CLGRO's continual effort to achieve legal recognition for same-sex relationships.

CLGRO opposes the current private member's Bill 45, which would recognize same-sex relationships in the Ontario Human Rights Code only. Under Bill 45, 79 of Ontario's laws would not be amended to specifically recognize same-sex relationships.

Geoff Gibson, a member of CLGRO from Toronto, said CLGRO's working group on relationship recognition has put together three 30-second television ads demanding same-sex spousal recognition.

The ads, which were produced on a volunteer basis, emphasize that "there are all kinds of families," said Gibson, and depict same-sex couples who are denied the rights that heterosexual couples enjoy in Ontario.

The television spots will be distributed to stations across Ontario who will decide whether to air the ads on the basis of free air time.

CLGRO members also received an update on Project Affirmation, a CLGRO group which, according to Gibson, is currently "touring parts of the province asking for input regarding how social services in Ontario can be improved for gays, lesbians and bisexuals."

Upon completion of its tour, the federally-funded project plans to present the federal government with a list of ways to improve social services.

As well, CLGRO agreed this weekend to support a brief protesting immigration laws which discriminate on the basis of sexual

The next Steering Committee meeting of the CLGRO will take place during the last week in February at the University of Western Ontario.

Queen's plan as a possibility at Western.

"We still feel you need two years to do a good MBA degree," Killing said.

Wong defended the proposal saying the two school's aims will be different, with Western's program offering a more general focus in the MBA program, and with the new Queen's program being altered to concentrate only on the science and technology fields.

In addition, Wong said, changes to its structure will make it possible to condense the program into 12 months. Some classes will get longer, so the number of credits and contact hours in the program remain the same as they are in the current two-year program, he said.

Katherine Philips said she felt that the changes to the curriculum, in terms of its greater specialization, were a positive step.

"We [Ontario] don't have the money to have 17 all-purpose universities any more," Philips said. "But specialization and privatization do not need to come hand-in-hand."

Universities across the country are organizing events in memory of the fourteen women killed at the Université de Montreal's Ecole Polytechnique on Dec. 6, 1989.

At Queen's, a series of events have been organized by the Education Commission of the Alma Mater Society.

AMS Education Commissioner Clare Fielding said this year's events differ slightly in focus from other years. "This year there has been an attempt to broaden the scope of the program, without losing the tragedy of Dec. 6 as the most important theme," she said.

Fielding mentioned yoga and self defense workshops as new ideas this year. "These techniques are designed to help women cope with their stress and fear. Dec. 6 is still a very emotional memory for many women. It was a real eye-opener for many, forcing them to acknowledge that violence towards women is an immediate problem," she said.

The following events will be occurring between Dec. 2 and 7, in remembrance of the tragedy of Dec. 6, 1989.

More information can be obtained from the Education Commission at 545-2725.

THURSDAY DEC. 2 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Empowerment Through Yoga — A Woman's Workshop. John Deutsch University Centre Oak Room.

3:30-5:30 p.m. Panel discussion on Gun Control Since Montreal — followed by an informal discussion in Macdonald Hall, Theatres D and E, sponsored by Queen's Women and the Law.

SUNDAY DEC. 5 7 to 10:30 p.m. Women's Coffee House at the Queen's Grad Club, sponsored by Queen's Women and the Law.

MONDAY DEC. 6 9 a.m. Open Memorial Ceremony in Grant Hall, sponsored by the Chaplain's Office and members of the university community.

7 p.m. Remembrance Vigil and Speakout at Grant Hall. Sponsored by the Queen's Women's Centre. There will be an open microphone.

9 p.m. Men Working to End Male Violence Against Women — panel discussion and open microphone, sponsored by the Kingston Men's Network for Change. Location to be announced.

TUESDAY DEC. 7 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Self-Defence for Women seminar in the JDUC Oak Room.

Award honours Montreal women

BY SARAH COOPER
The Queen's Journal

Janet Gaskin, a fourth-year civil engineering student, is this year's winner of the Canadian Engineering Memorial Foundation scholarship, an award established in memory of the 14 women who were murdered at Montreal's Ecole

Janet Gaskin

Polytechnique on Dec. 6, 1989.

The purpose of the award, which was established by the Canadian Council of Professional Engineers, is to encourage young women to pursue engineering in school and in the workplace.

Proud to receive the scholarship, Gaskin said accepting the award entailed accepting the responsibility of being a role model

"I have to speak to as many people as I can, to show them that being a female engineer is a norm and a positive one. That way they can overcome this fear of the unknown," Gaskin said.

As well, Gaskin said people are apt to perceive others not as individuals but as versions of stereotypes. "People think being a civil engineer means I am a bridge builder, but two of 42 students in my class worked on sites this summer. The rest worked with computers," she said.

Gaskin hopes to help eliminate this stereotype as well as the female stigma attached to engineering through her future work in the profession. She said she looks forward to the day when she is introduced and respected as an engineer, and not as a woman engineer.

$35,000 AMS computer purchase defeated

Wilson promises new proposal in 1994

BY CARINA BLOFIELD
The Queen's Journal

A proposal to buy $35,000 worth of new computer equipment for Alma Mater Society offices was narrowly defeated at AMS Assembly last Thursday, by a vote of 13-11. But Assembly will have another proposal before it in the new year, according to AMS Vice-President (Operations) Tim Wilson.

Wilson told The Journal that everyone in the AMS offices feels the purchase is necessary and justifiable, but concerns arose at Assembly over the large sum of money involved, the desire to pass the proposal immediately, and insufficient explanation of the specific needs of the offices.

The AMS proposal seeks to upgrade the current computer resources by adding new hardware and software, and connecting the AMS office to the University EtherNet system.

The purchase of EtherNet chips — which would cost $9,720 — would give the AMS access to the mainframe, and allow communication with individuals across campus, at other universities in Canada and around the world. Funding for the purchase would come from the AMS unallocated surplus fund of $500,000.

Ron Turley, AMS business administrator, described the proposal as "not bringing the AMS to the 21st century, but just to an acceptable level." The current computers, he said, are "old, slow, and modern software won't run on them."

The AMS has been using the same computer facilities without any upgrades since 1988, he said. According to Turley, the offices are badly in need of a comprehensive upgrade, rather than gradual, piecemeal alterations.

One of the major setbacks the AMS faces with the old computers, Turley said, is that "other student unions want to communicate with us, but can't. Virtually all the other unions are connected to a mainframe."

The need for some upgrading may be clear, but the extent of the upgrade and the timing remain contentious.

Heath Grant, Arts and Science Undergraduate Society vice-president, clarified that he voted against the process, not the eventual purchase of computers.

"I can see there is a need," he said. "But there hasn't been enough planning. Some of the costs could be reduced."

Grant called the proposal before Assembly a request to "rubber stamp a $35,000 withdrawal."

He does not believe the figures provided to Assembly constituted proper research.

Grant called for a "detailed proposal, outlining exactly where [the computers] will be needed and exactly why they need the computers." He also questioned the rush imposed on the proposal, and emphasized the need for further deliberation.

Wilson explained the motive behind the haste. Campus Computer Services agreed to install the new computer features over the holidays, he said, which would have made the procedure easier and less disruptive to the AMS.

According to Rector David Baar, some Assembly members ob-

The University of New Brunswick Brunswick and the Association of University of New Brunswick Teachers voted to lift the suspension of math professor Martin Yaqzan. Yaqzan attracted international attention when he published his controversial views on date rape in the UNB student newspaper in November, including the opinion that women should be prepared to accept monetary compensation for rape.

jeeted in light of the rapidity of changing technology.

"If we just wait a month, is there going to be new technology?" Baar asked, questioning the proposal's choice of 386 computers and wondering about the introduction of the newly-developed pentium chip in 1994.

As Wilson's proposal to Assembly states, "the bottom line is that all of these upgrades are inevitable, and it is just a matter of whether the AMS wishes to overcome many of the computer problems associated with using outdated technology right now or once again leave it up to the next administration."

Wilson said the motion to upgrade the computer system will come up again before Assembly in the new year.

Baar said he hopes that when the proposal is revived, "they'll have come up with something slightly different" which accounts for the forthcoming changes in technology.

September

"I could write a cheque to my friend and say it was a Kids-For-Kids expense, and no one would be the wiser." —Heath Grant, Arts and Science Undergraduate Society vice-president, on financial accountability.

IN THE FIRST ISSUE of the academic year, The Journal reported on a sexual assault which occurred at 4 a.m. on the Thursday morning of Orientation Week. The victim of the assault, a third year Queen's student, wished to remain anonymous, but told the story of waking up to find a male intruder fondling her. "I couldn't feel more unsafe, I couldn't feel more vulnerable than I do now."

In other news, mathematics professor Cedric Schubert, who was convicted in Dec. 1992 for the sexual assault and indecent assault of his stepdaughter which occurred a decade ago, elected to exercise his right to take an extended leave of absence, a year of sabbatical in 1994, and retire.

While Orientation was a success on most fronts, the Transfer Student Orientation Week, or trash week, was cancelled by the Senate Orientation Activity Review Board because of unsanctioned events and reports of alcohol consumption by members of the trash executive and trash leaders.

On Sept. 10, the Vote Education campaign officially launched their non-partisan endeavour to canvas federal candidates in the Oct. 25 election to determine their position on post-secondary education in Canada.

Carleton University decided to duck out of participating in the 1993 installment of the Maclean's annual university rankings. Later in September, Memorial also dropped out of the rankings, alleging that the ranking system is "fatally flawed."

An engineering semi-formal banquet in Leonard Cafeteria degenerated into a full-fledged food fight in late September, costing the Engineering Society $400 in clean-up charges. First-year engineer Andrew McLeod said that Applied Science Dean Carl Hamacher was "walking around dodging stuff being thrown."

Match-making in the 90's became a difficult proposition for Canadian law school graduates, as 35 per cent were unable to achieve matches with firms and government for articling positions in the Toronto match. Law Dean Don Carter blamed the problem on "the economy, plain and simple."

In the final issue of the month, The Journal reported that the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance had lost its largest member, the University of Toronto Student Administrative Council. AMS President Katherine Philips said the decision by U of T would "not tarnish" the reputation or credibility of OUSA.

The results of a survey filled out by engineering students last year revealed student dissatisfaction with the faculty, labelled teaching methods "stagnant," and criticized student-administration relations.

On Oct. 19, The Journal reported on the sexual assault of a female Queen's student, which occurred in an alley between King Street East and the Toucan Pub. The victim of the sexual assault described her three male attackers as "visibly drunk" and as looking "like someone you would see in your classes."

Results of the Vote Education campaign survey were returned, with only 28 candidates in Ontario filling out the survey personally. While some submitted official party answers, many did not respond at all, including Reform Party's Sean McAdam and Liberal incumbent Peter Milliken.

On Oct. 25, Peter Milliken was returned to the House of Commons, as Kingston and the Islands voted in accordance with the rest

On Oct. 5, The Journal reported the resignation of Kingston City Mayor Helen Cooper. Cooper left to chair the Ontario Municipal Board in Toronto, a lucrative $110,000 per year post.

Engineering frosh tackle greasepole.

An October Saturday night at Alfie's featured a chronic case of over-exposure, as several male patrons were asked to leave the bar after they were spotted at a table with their pants undone and their genitals exposed. The incident was complicated by reports of a female off-duty Queen's security officer being seated at the same table.

Queen's University announced the appointment of Dr. William Leggett as its future principal on Oct. 12. Leggett, 54, is a population biologist of international renown, and the current vice-principal (academics) at McGill. He will take over the reins from Principal Smith next September.

On Oct. 13 and 14, Queen's said yes to OUSA and no to Surface in the fall referendum. Arts and Science students delivered a mandate to discontinue funding Surface, as 55.6 per cent voted against the paper in the ASUS referendum. Meanwhile, AMS President Katherine Philips was "thrilled" at the OUSA referendum results, as Queen's students passed a 95-cent student interest fee to fund OUSA, by a margin of 273 votes out of 2,799 votes cast.

On Oct. 19, The Journal reported on the sexual assault of a female Queen's student, which occurred in an alley between King Street East and the Toucan Pub. The victim of the sexual assault described her three male attackers as "visibly drunk" and as looking "like someone you would see in your classes."

On Oct. 25, Peter Milliken was returned to the House of Commons, as Kingston and the Islands voted in accordance with the rest of Ontario, decisively choosing the Liberals, who swept almost every seat in the province. Queen's witnessed its first homecoming street party in six years, as naked dancers, drunk alumni and students, and elated baseball fans emptied into University Avenue to celebrate the Toronto Blue Jays' second consecutive World Series victory.

The third annual Maclean's university rankings issue hit newsstands in mid-November, with Queen's placing second in the medical/doctoral category behind McGill.

The Surface debate took a new twist in November, as ASUS executive opted to look into making Surface funding opt-outable, subject to approval by referendum in February. A previous motion to delete Surface from the ASUS constitution, which incited vehement opposition from Yes side supporters, was removed from the table.

The newly-opened Parent Resource Centre was the subject of reproach in late November, as Queen's Mature Students Association representative Jack Troughton called the centre "a token effort" by the AMS executive. Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell, Academic Affairs Commissioner Taz Pirmohanand and Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin blasted the AMS executive for being unsupportive and unresponsive, exhibiting inappropriate behaviour, and working at cross-purposes with their commissions.

On Oct. 29, The Journal reported on the tabling of a proposal to privatize Queen's masters of business administrative program — and hike tuition for MBA students to $20,000 for a twelve-month degree. MBA Chairperson Ken Wong explained, "if we don't privatize, we're never going to be world class."

AMS Vice-President (University Affairs) Todd Minerson said "there was no intention from the beginning for [the centre] top be a drop-off centre."

Meanwhile, the review and renegotiation of the campus food services contract now held by Marriott Foods continued without student representation on the decision-making committee. AMS President Philips said that while the administration is giving students an advisory role in the process, it is insisting that students not be part of the final decision because the contract negotiation is a financial matter.

Emmerson resigned at the AMS Annual Corporate Meeting on Nov. 11, citing a lack of "open lines of communication and trust" as one of the reasons for her decision. Emmerson also criticized AMS President Katherine Philips for being unaware of her duties with the Board of Directors, and said she disagreed with the AMS restructuring plans and the decision not to "budget for zero."

At the same meeting, Media Services Director Eric Jabal prompted protest from The Journal and at least one AMS Assembly member over comments he made relating to Journal autonomy. Jabal complained that the AMS "foot[s] the bill," but lacks control over what is printed. Journal editor-in-chief Sarah MacWhirter called his comments a serious threat to the editorial autonomy of the paper.

INAUGUST, Queen's mourned the loss of Dr. Catherine Brown, a distinguished associate professor in the department of History. Brown, who was honoured with the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching in 1983, died in her sleep on Aug. 17. She was 64.

Frank Tindall, a Canadian football legend and admired member of the Queen's community, died in Kingston on Oct. 5 at the age of 84. Tindall was "The Kindly Old Coach" of the Queen's Golden Gaels football team for 29 years and a former star in the Canadian Football League.

Don't leave your home alone

BY DEANA COLLINS and KRISTEN KUINNAS The Queen's Journal

With the holiday season steadily approaching, many students are concerned about safeguarding their belongings from theft.

But thanks to the Alma Mater Society Housing Issues Committee, a "Winter Holiday House Check," has been created to alleviate anxiety.

For two dollars per visit, the AMS will arrange for a Queen's student to perform a security house check. The service ensures that a number of duties will be performed.

Mail will be collected or sid under your door, a full exterior house check will be made and any snow on your pathway will be walked upon to give the appearance of someone being at home.

The student assigned to a house is also responsible for verifying the cancellation of any newspaper subscriptions and for notifying you, your landlord or the police of potential problems.

Constable Dave Bishop of the Kingston Police Force said he thought the AMS Winter Holiday House Check was a great idea. He urged students to use their common sense before vacating their houses for the holidays.

"Don't advertise your absence," Bishop advised. "Give your house the lived-in look." Bishop recommended that students not lend keys, and suggested they put their lights on timers. He said valuables should be taken home or left in safety deposit boxes.

He also advised students to make sure that their answering machines do not reveal any prolonged absence. Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin told The Journal that in addition to the Winter Holiday House Check, "simple, common sense" measures could save students a lot of hassle.

She said students should be certain to lock their front and back doors, and assure that balcony, basement and fire escape windows are secured.

Nevin recommended that students nail accessible windows shut from the inside, and line windows with a plastic covering, in the interest of saving heat and deterring intruders.

Also, student ghetto residents should turn their thermostat down to 15 degrees rather than the typically-suggested 10 degrees, said Nevin, "because there's so much heat loss in the ghetto that even if you're keeping the temperature at 15 degrees, it's more like eight degrees" in your house.

Nevin noted that if the temperature in the house dips too low, frost forms on the windows — a tell-tale sign to thieves that the house is vacant for the holidays.

Warning against over-exuberant house-safing measures, Nevin suggested that student not "go bonkers with timers."

Pick one or two items to be activated by a timer, she said, adding that upstairs bedroom lights, kitchen lights and television sets are good choices.

Nevin said students could also give a trusted friend the key to their house, and have them "go over and eat food and listen to your stereo once a week."

QP needs soundproofing

soundproofing the pub area over the December break. Consultants from Toronto have already examined the pub area, and will soon offer an estimate of costs. QP Manager Nancy Murphy said this option could prove expensive, "probably a five-digit number."

As to who would pick up the tab, opinions vary. Murphy said the JDUC should cover the costs, "considering that the grad students were there first, and they [the JDUC] decided to put the pub here."

Dutton concurred. "We are renting the space from the university and they should be able to provide this," he said.

However, Williams told The Journal, "it would be the AMS that would pick it up — if that room wasn't being used as a pub we wouldn't have a problem."

Hocoy said he thought soundproofing would go further than the current "quick fix," but warned, "there's no guarantee that even with insulation, you won't hear everything."

Murphy called the situation "very frustrating," in light of an otherwise successful year. She said the noise problems have "been here forever. Ever since the QP opened there's been complaints from above."

As for the future, Murphy feels the soundproofing is essential. "As far as I'm concerned it has to be done, because there's no way we can continue to run our business with these restrictions over our head," she said. "By the same token I can understand completely where the grad students are coming from."

Arts '94 Formal Theme

The theme of the Arts '94 formal will be Elegance by Twilight. This theme, submitted by Meredith Ash, was the favourite of the 487 students who voted. It beat out Alice in Wonderland, Tropical Rainforest, Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, and Space Odyssey. Additionally, students voted 341-78 for an open bar.

ASSEMBLY REPORT

The last Alma Mater Society Assembly in 1993 took place last Thursday. In addition to the rector's report on the resignation of the Board of Directors chair, Assembly defeated a proposal to spend over $35,000 on new computer equipment, and discussed Vids in the Hall's forecast deficit.

• Rector reports on Emmerson

Rector David Baar presented his report to Assembly on the resignation of Catherine Emmerson, the former chair of the Board of Directors.

In his report, Baar said the main reason for Emmerson's resignation was quite simply because she felt that for her personally it was the best thing to do.

Baar said Emmerson was frustrated by the tacitness of proposals to the Board of Directors, which made it hard for the board to be "anything more than a rubber stamp for management." She disagreed with AMS surplus budgeting, as well as with restructuring plans.

Further, Baar's report said, Emmerson "cited as a source of frustration her perception that [AMS President Katherine] Philips did not take on her full responsibility with respect to the Board of Directors," as well as her heavy workload, as problems which led to her resignation.

Baar wrote, "some of the difficulties that Ms. Emmerson experienced could, I feel, be attributed to structural factors ... But I feel that the primary reason for Ms. Emmerson's resignation was that the usual frustrations of working within the AMS meant that chairing the Board had, from Ms. Emmerson's perspective, simply become more trouble than it was worth."

• Computer purchase fails

A plan to purchase $35,372 worth of new computer equipment for the AMS was narrowly defeated by Assembly. The vote was 13-11, with five abstentions.

The vote followed extensive debate on the issue.

Former Work Bursary Co-ordinator Mike O'Connor attacked the proposal for "a Mercedes Benz worth of computers." He called the purchase "monumentally expensive and unjustifiable," and suggested that for under $500 the AMS could hook up to InterNet, rather than purchasing $9,720 worth of EtherNet cards as the proposal recommended.

Clare Fielding, AMS education commissioner, said it is necessary to link her commission with other universities.

Baar suggested the AMS should match its technology to its needs.

• Vids facing deficit

AMS Administrative Services Director Stephanie Taylor informed Assembly of "the enormous deficit that Vids in the Hall will incur this year." She admitted that "we probably should have informed Assembly earlier," but said she was afraid of spreading misinformation.

Commerce Society President John Wilkin said, "all that can be done is a little damage control." He suggested a market survey to determine hours of operation, as well as "more effective advertising."

• Of note ...

The new Board of Directors chair will be Grant Hughes, formerly the board's vice-chair.

Arts and Science Undergraduate Society President Jenn Steeves said, "we have revised our budget so that Surface no longer exists in our budget, and will not receive any funding this year."

Regarding the ongoing mediation between the executive and unhappy commissioners, AMS Vice-President (University Affairs) Todd Minerson said, "the general sense I get is that things are finally being addressed. It's a step in the right direction. I'm very happy with it."

ComSoc's Wilkin called the proposal to privatize Queen's MBA program "a sound move ...

we see this as a trend that's inevitable."

Mature Students Association representative Jack Troughton expressed a concern that the current restructuring of the AMS "will be a way to make the AMS more profitable and gut the services." But Minerson said, "people get very suspicious every time something like this takes place." In fact, he said, no decisions have been made yet.

Assembly passed motions for the establishment of the AMS Achievement Award, the Queen's Chinese Catholic Community Constitution, and the Queen's Writer's Guild Constitution.

In a reflective vein, Engineering Society President Mark Simpson said, "AMS has grown a lot over the years. Sometimes we lose track of the student aspect of things. ... We should take a step back [and] give credit where it's deserved."

• Assembled humour

Concurrent Education Students Association President Pete Stuart perceptively observed, "I even have a mug on my backpack. I'm wearing my Queen's uniform." Baar was quick to call Stuart "completely fashionable."

Challenging Baar's traditional dominance in the humour department, Stuart later suggested using the names "Bob and Edna" to represent AMSCOICS and AMSCOISS, two tongue-twisting AMS committees. "They're a lot shorter, they're just as meaningful, and they're easier to say," he argued.

Journal Assistant News Editor Brad Elder appeared briefly at Assembly, naked.

Assembly members applauded Speaker Chris Doering for denying Baar a point of clarification.

Many students work hard day in and day out to ensure that the needs of the student body are met by the Alma Mater Society. Our role in this process is to keep our elected officials and their highest appointed employees accountable. To that end, we cover issues and events raised and held by the AMS, as well as those brought to their attention. This report card is an attempt to put the year so far into perspective.

We recognize that a lot goes on that never reaches our eyes or ears, and we apologize for any good efforts that went unnoticed. It is the nature of our business, however, that we see and hear more of the contentious issues facing our student leaders. With that in mind, let the grades begin...

PRESIDENT
KATHERINE PHILIPS

Katherine has not exactly been the most visible of AMS presidents. This may be because she spends a great amount of time behind the scenes assimilating knowledge on a wide variety of topics. She was highly successful negotiating lower ancillary fees for Queen's students. That in itself is a major victory for all students.

Unfortunately, Katherine has found anything but victory when it comes to coordinating the social and corporate sides of her council. Though she is using the Executive Decision Centre to settle council disputes, the situation itself indicates a lack of leadership. It seems that her response to the situation has been entirely reactive in nature.

With a council that is ripping apart at the seams, a strong leadership role is essential for not only the successful day-to-day operations of the government but for responding to students needs as well.

VICE-PRESIDENT (OPERATIONS)
TIM WILSON

Tim must be commended for running a tight ship. It would appear that he has put his Commerce training into good practice.

But this is also where we find fault. Although he is working incredibly hard for what he believes in, (corporate restructuring), he is alienating a lot of people along the way. Tim seems to have forgotten who he is working for. As a student representative, he should be more willing to listen to the needs of both those he works with and the student body. Tim must pay more attention to the political and social implications of his goals and actions.

VICE-PRESIDENT (UNIVERSITY AFFAIRS)
TODD MINERSON

Like Katherine, Todd has not been that visible this year. He is taking a careful and comprehensive approach to the restructuring of the society side of the AMS, and for this he should be complimented.

However, the Daycare Centre, which is under his domain, has become a symbol of what the AMS making the grade...

has not done. His approach has been passive to the point of bordering on meek. Todd should stand up and ensure that the society side of the AMS is secured within the AMS. From his position he could be speaking to a number of issues and providing a voice for a number of students.

ACADEMIC AFFAIRS COMMISSIONER
TAZ PIRMOHAMMED

Projects coming out of Academic Affairs have been largely successful. Taz succeeded in securing OUSA funding, though questions remain as to what she would have done had the referendum failed. OUSA now is a much stronger voice for students.

Some of the credit for OUSA's strength must go to all those who worked on it before this academic year. But congratulations must also go to Taz for her dedication to making the organization stronger.

The Vote Education campaign was a large undertaking requiring a lot of time and effort. In her report afterwards, Taz discussed the fact that the campaign was short-staffed, short-funded, and she admits mistakes that were made - something rarely done.

CAMPUS ACTIVITIES COMMISSIONER
ALISON MITCHELL

Alison has shown herself to be dedicated and capable in her position. Were it not for the Blue Jays, Alumni Weekend would have gone off without a hitch. Although events were poorly attended, this is par for the course.

After Frosh Week Alison identified major structural problems, sought solutions and implemented them. Making structural changes in the AMS is never easy, but Alison managed to do so smoothly and for the betterment of all involved.

She is also working hard to make sure that volunteers are recognized for the work they do. She stresses accountability, and has put forward a resolution that commissioners report all resignations within their commission.

COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSIONER
DERA NEVIN

Dera is probably one of the best resources the AMS has. Dera began the year by rebuilding the commission from scratch.

Dera does an inordinate amount of work behind the scenes. She has a huge agenda, but unfortunately she does not have the time and people for all she wants to accomplish.

With Dera in office we have finally seen some movement from the AMS on the housing issue. She is also determined to hold the AMS accountable for all of its actions.

EDUCATION COMMISSIONER
CLARE HELDING

The Education Commission has the lowest profile ever. The Women's Issues Committee is without a Chair, and perhaps as a result, nothing was prepared for the national week against violence against women.

The Commission does deserve congratulations for the first Rainbow Week at Queen's. Although, like the commission, it was not a high profile week, it was nevertheless a much needed effort that will only continue to grow in recognition.

The Vision 2000 proposal for an intercultural centre on campus looks like it might have an exciting and promising future.

INTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMISSIONER
BOB ADDERLEY

Internal Affairs is one of those commissions that we hear little of unless something is not going well. As of yet, we have heard very little.

Bob has good public relations skills making him successful at keeping his commission running smoothly. Those who have relied on him for assistance have received prompt attention.

Opt-outs were up this year, and perhaps a more aggressive advertising campaign stressing the need for financial commitment from students may have diminished the upward trend.

SERVICES DIRECTOR (A)
JESS DUTTON

As Services Director (A), Jess is responsible for overseeing Alfie's, the Quiet Pub, Work Bursary, the Queen's Entertainment Agency and the Tricolour Express. In this position, Jess has proven himself a capable and approachable administrator.

Jess has been supportive of the new manager at Work Bursary, helping her make the program a success. He has gone to bat for the Quiet Pub and has proven himself very competent in dealings with the residence and Vice-Principal Williams.

The QEA has been very active this year, without the problems it had last year. It's good to see the QEA and Alfie's working together for the betterment of both organizations.

We applaud Jess for going beyond the scope of his responsibilities by writing a letter to VP Williams regarding the student role in the Marriott contract negotiations.

The only dark spot in Jess's tenure thus far is the lack of student support for Alfie's. Jess could play a larger role in spurring initiatives that might increase Alfie's attractiveness.

SERVICES DIRECTOR (B)
STEPHANIE TAYLOR

As Services Director (B), Stephanie is responsible for overseeing the Walk Home Service, Vids in the Hall, the Entrepreneurial Centre, Student Co-stables and Bus-It. Stephanie is in the difficult position of overseeing the successful operations of two new operations, and like with most new ventures, the road has not been entirely smooth.

When she stepped into her position, Stephanie inherited a disaster with the Vids in the Hall. However, she herself could have played a much larger role in improving the marketing strategy of the Halling rental operation. The problems the store is facing should have been brought to the attention of Assembly at an earlier date, a fact Stephanie admits.

While improvements were made with Walk Home, it seems that perhaps the staff now is being squeezed a little too hard. Questions have also been raised this year as to the mandate of student committees, questions that should be addressed. In the gift-buying season, the Entrepreneurial Centre seems to be getting off the ground.

MEDIA SERVICES DIRECTOR
ERIC JABAL

The Media Services Director is responsible for overseeing Studio Q, the Queen's Journal, the Where/What's Next, the Tricolour Yearbook and the Publishing and Copy Centre. Eric has proven himself to be a competent administrator, though concerns have been raised regarding some of his methods.

The P&CC has been enjoying a very successful year. As well, Studio Q, with the purchase of their infamous "toaster," has increased its visibility and is continually increasing in popularity.

Conflicts arose over the Tricolour Yearbook due to a number of transitional problems that Eric is working to address. The manner in which the situation was handled, however, left something to be desired.

Eric found himself the centre of contention after making remarks threatening the editorial autonomy of The Journal. While we recognize that he is well-intentioned, his tendency to exert authority in matters beyond his control has been the cause of conflict. This is in part caused by the ambiguous nature of his position, a problem he is working to address through the plans for restructuring.

That completes the grading for the end of the first term. The AMS faces a number of structural problems and contentious issues that we hope these structural problems will be dealt with in a cautious and inclusive manner, and we hope our student government will tackle these issues head on. The student government is the voice of the student body. We are looking forward to a loud and active 1994.

The Queen's Journal wishes everyone a safe and happy holiday.

Four years ago at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal, fourteen women - all engineering students - were brutally murdered by an angry man. As a result, awareness about violence against women reached new heights. Although more proactive measures are being taken on campuses to prevent violence against women, as we have seen, the problem is far from alleviated.

December 6 is not just a reminder of tragedy in our past. It is the official recognition of something many women are reminded of every day. This issue attempts to paint out how attitudes and actions toward women affect many aspects of our lives - in the world of sport, entertainment, our creative interests, and the political realm that surrounds us. On Monday, as we should every day, we remember...

Are your finances for next semester done like dinner?

Hey, we don't want to ruin your appetite. But between those monster holiday meals, you might think about how you'll get through next semester. And if it looks a little scary, check out Bank of Montreal's new Student Loan.

You can apply for a loan of up to $5,000 for each year of 5 years of undergraduate study, up to $20,000 in total, and up to $10,000 for 2 years of post-graduate studies.* You'll be taking advantage of special student interest rates, and you just have to make interest payments while you're in school.

If you want to speed up the borrowing process, just line up a potential co-signer over the holidays. It could make life easier, especially if you're attending a school away from home.

To find out more, drop by your nearest Bank of Montreal branch. In the meantime, we wish you a very happy holiday, and bon appetit!

Call our Queen's Student Hotline for more information
545-3022

*Available to full-time students, entering any year of post-secondary education at a recognized Canadian community college, university, or polytechnical school. Bank of Montreal eligibility and credit requirements must be met. See your branch for complete details.

Editorial Criticized

The Editor
As a student I appreciate The Journal's aggressive critique of the executive's ability to preform its role in the management of both the corporate and society side of the AMS. Editorial power is and always has been one of the most effective sources of achieving AMS accountability to the students they serve. However, The Journal's ability to pass judgement is not itself beyond fallibility.

The editorial board suggests that by simply "paying a trained employee" the Parent Resource Centre will become a "full functioning daycare service." Oversimplification of the issue may allow the editorial board to take cheap shots at the Child Care Committee and the executive but they do little to examine the true nature of the problem of child care.

Had the editorial board taken the time to peruse the Child Care Feasibility Study (1993) prepared by Susan Galloway, they might have discovered the inconsistency with the "obvious" solution they present. In the synthesis of her study Ms. Galloway concludes that "the service should begin on a small scale" as "the available data does not identify days and hours which the service would be used." Finally she advises that "a pilot program is suggested in order that further data on usage patterns and needs could be collected." It was upon these directives that the Centre was initiated.

In no way does this letter seek to deny that the Parent Resource Centre is without problems. Child Care Committee members would be among the first to describe obstacles facing the centre had any members of editorial board approached them. Unfortunately no primary sources of information were solicited. The greatest challenge to the centre is the wide variance in the times which student parents require the service. When parents sign in they are asked to fill in a log book indicating which hours best accommodate their schedules.

The Centre's hours of operation, 10:00 a.m. - 2:00 p.m., were selected as trial hours. Part of the Centre's mandate is to evaluate the needs of student parents to achieve better accessibility. A process of need-evaluation requires a period longer than three weeks to achieve any degree of reliability. While the Child Care Committee appreciates the editorial board's eagerness for immediate results, their criticism accomplishes little more than senselessly bashing the Centre's attempt to determine the most effective way to serve student parents.

The editorial board's allegation that the executive and Child Care Committee are a group of misers unwilling to spend the cash to provide a "full-functioning daycare service" is unwarranted. To fund a trained care giver without proper knowledge of what hours are most needed by student parents is financially irresponsible. The Child Care Committee will advise the executive to lease a licensed care giver only when it believes it has completely assessed the needs of student parents.

If the editorial board truly wishes to help in the process of bringing effective child care to Queen's it should seek to engage in activities which work with the efforts of the committee, rather than simply making irrelevant criticisms based on an incorrect perception of the mandate of the Centre. It is far easier, in campus politics, to become involved in throwing shit than it is to become active in the solution of a problem.

Sexist offense

The Editor,
I was quite disappointed upon reading Friday, Nov. 26's Journal to find a very sexist and offensive remark. Christopher Zabel, in his review of Carlito's Way says "[a]nd Penelope Ann Miller, apart from looking great naked, is quite touching in her blind love for our hero." It doesn't matter that this is atypical Hollywood attitude to take towards women. It is insulting. It objectifies women, and it lessens the existence of every woman to a man's pleasure, by reducing her role to that of "looking great naked." I am very saddened that any campus newspaper (especially one whose editor-in-chief is a woman) would support an attitude that contributes to the degradation and dehumanization of women. Golden Words recently issued an apology for a similar remark. The Journal would be devaluing their effort not to do the same. The Journal would also be denying the hard work done up until now towards the equality of the sexes. The Journal's editorials for the two weeks previous to the publishing of the article in question both dealt with date rape. The attitudes still held by many on this subject, which were countered in these editorials, are supported by the remark made by Zabel. When a man sees a woman as the object of his pleasure and nothing more, there is nothing to stop him from treating her as he might a dog or a piece of furniture. There is nothing to stop him from abusing her, sexually, physically and emotionally. Women are people. Women have rights. Women have feelings. And women are good for a lot more than "looking great naked." But how is a boy supposed to learn that on his way to becoming a man if all he hears are comments like that made by Zabel?

MBA editorial corrected

The Editor,
I am writing in response to your editorial of Nov. 26 ("MBA Proposal a roll of the dice"). As MBA Program Chair, I think it important to correct certain inaccuracies within the editorial, not only in defence of the proposal but also in my capacity as a provider of career advice to prospective MBA students.

First, allow me to address the concern over accessibility to the MBA program. A unique set of external circumstances coupled with my colleagues' willingness to innovate in the areas of curriculum design, teaching technology and program scheduling enables us to INCREASE accessibility not decrease it. As you correctly note, the new program permits entry into the workforce a full eight months shorter than the existing two-year program. Assuming an average starting salary of $50,000 (note that under the associated income contingent repayment scheme, no payment is required if employment is not found), a student receives a positive economic gain except in the rare case that a student earns over $15,000 via summer employment.

Moreover, because the program now is 12 instead of 20 months in duration, a much larger array of Canadians, especially those with families, will be able to consider a return to school. Finally, while not known outside the School of Business faculty, the new program has a number of provisions, such as on-site daycare, which enhance the ability of single parents (most of whom are female) to secure promising business careers. In short, accessibility must be measured by more than just the price of tuition: when it is, the new MBA program compares favourably.

Second, in response to your concern over a "vicious circle" of employment as a prerequisite to pursuit of an MBA, it should be noted that the "new" program is no different from the existing program in that regard. Almost 98 per cent of our current students have at least one year of work experience and the average is four years.

This is not significantly different from other MBA programs. This has nothing to do with the cost of an MBA. Rather, it reflects the different nature of an MBA degree, how it fits with most people's career paths and the recruiting preferences of prospective employers.

In contrast to many other graduate degrees, an MBA is not usually pursued immediately after undergraduate studies. It is widely accepted in both business and academic circles that the combination of work experience and a rigorous academic program improves the quality of the educational experience: the students are more mature, they have a better perspective with which to consider the application of course concepts to the workplace and the quality of classroom discussions is enhanced. Indeed, I know of no MBA program today that does not advise students to work before returning for an MBA. For all of these reasons, employers are better disposed to MBA graduates who worked prior to returning to school. This does not imply that work experience is essential. We believe that the evaluation of an individual's capacities should not be driven by a rigid application of external measures. The new program calls for an extensive and rigorous admissions process that will attempt to measure, on an individual-by-individual basis, intellectual and professional potential in a variety of ways, only one of which is work experience.

My third area of contention relates to our price competitiveness versus U.S. programs. Our new program will still be roughly one-half the price of leading 12-month European programs or two year programs at major U.S. schools. We have been able to maintain this price advantage without a sacrifice in the quality of education by re-engineering our curriculum around a particular area of specialization. We thus have the equivalent of a cost advantage tied to our underlying, and many would say, innovative "educational technology" a condition similar to that which enabled Japanese companies to successfully penetrate North American markets in the 1970s and 1980s. We do not purport to be all things to all people, the way that a Harvard or Michigan might. Rather, we have chosen to concentrate our resources on fully satisfying a subset of the market.

Our discussions with private sector organizations show total consensus on this issue. While there may have been a time when people would pay for "reputation" under the trust that reputation meant productivity, the same is no longer true. Even the much esteemed Harvard has come under increasing fire from the corporate sector for turning out analysts and consultants who were unable to manage or work with people. Our new program emphasizes these so-called "soft" leadership and entrepreneurial skills. The result? Business audiences with whom we have vetted the program's design literally "stand up and applaud."

To be certain, you are quite correct in challenging the notion that we will be an "overnight success." World-class status, like anything else, is earned over time. But does this mean we should not take the first step? If not, then we accept a future of mediocrity. Why should you as students be willing to accept anything less than our best? On a larger scale, we have attempted to develop a program that advances Canada's national interest and responds to issues of global importance. Canada needs expertise in the scientific and technological arenas. Industry and government alike claim that our national capacity to compete in the so-called "new economy" and global marketplace is currently constrained by deficiencies in our "human infrastructure." This program is committed to helping overcome that problem.

In addition, given the critical need to manage the interface between business and the environment, a program directed at the science and technology sectors can make a positive contribution to the creation of managers with greater ecological sensitivity. I hope you will agree that these issues are of such vital importance that we, as a university, would be remiss in our responsibility to provide social leadership if we did not take appropriate actions. In short, the new MBA proposal is much more than just a $20,000 price tag. It is a commitment to an entirely different approach to professional education and to the social and educational objectives of that degree. We have not elaborated, even in this lengthy letter, on the full range of provisions we have sought to incorporate into the new degree: that would be inappropriate prior to our Faculty Board's and Senate's formal approval.

I must say that I agree wholeheartedly with your insistence that the new program not be seen as the "thin edge of the wedge." We are in a unique situation. I am not expert in other disciplines and therefore cannot comment on whether other schools and faculties could undertake a similar degree of specialization and course re-engineering or whether such moves would enable, if desired at all, a reduction in program duration. If they cannot, then accessibility likely would be reduced and the quality of a Queen's degree diminished under privatization. We in the School of Business are strongly committed to the principles that have made Queen's great. We simply feel that those principles can best be continued if the MBA program is allowed to operate under alternative funding arrangements.

I sincerely hope that the University community will not force us to accept a future of mediocrity because of a rigid adherence to a "one size fits all" approach to university funding. There is a better way. It is not the "right" way for all programs... but it is for us.

Could I Have Been Straight?

My parents don't like the fact that I'm gay. Actually, that's an understatement, they absolutely hate that I'm gay. They are forever telling me that I have to change to be able to function properly in this world. They are convinced that I'm just imagining things. They say that they will never be happy until I come to my senses and realize that I'm actually straight. I once asked my mother if she'd rather I was a murderer than be gay and she said yes. She went on to say that she liked everything about me except my insistence that I'm gay. She is proud that I finished school and am working on a Masters; she's overjoyed that I am not heavily into drugs; she's glad that I have some Muslim values and that I practice some Muslim traditions. Unfortunately, what she doesn't realize is that if I wasn't gay, I probably wouldn't be any of the other things that she likes about me.

Many people say that being attracted to members of the same sex is just one aspect of a person's life and has no bearing on any other part of that person's life. I don't agree. I find it very hard to believe that I would be the same person if I had turned out to be straight.

I'm a political person by nature. But I wonder if that would necessarily be the case if I hadn't discovered that I was gay. Much of my politics and awareness stems from my stumbling upon my true sexual orientation. Once I realized that I was gay, I started taking more interest in social justice, equal rights, human interaction, etc. Once I came out, I began to implement what I'd learned in the previous nine years. I became active in the fight against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and for equal rights for queers. In my struggle with these issues, I learned about many more issues like racism, sexism and physical abuse and how they related to homophobia. I quickly realized that fighting against one of these necessities fighting against them all. A person cannot separate them in the grand scheme of society. So if I had actually been straight, I would probably still be very homophobic and sexist. I would also probably have assaulted a woman without realizing it. Furthermore, I would not be aware of the magnitude of these types of discrimination as well as racism in this world.

All through high school, I was concerned with the way I looked and the way I dressed and presented myself. Many of my school-mates did not seem to have these same concerns as I had. They were more interested in where and when they were going to get 'another piece of ass.' They were also very sports oriented. I tried to join in. I often failed in my attempt to become proficient with a sport. In my blundering, however, I did manage to learn to participate in some sports with some guise of ability. I was asked by one of the school coaches if I wanted to play football. I was shocked that he would ask me to

Rape Yesterday and Today

The following is the full text of Dr. Martin Yaqzan's letter to the University of New Brunswick's newspaper, The Brunswickian.

Language changes with time; new words come into usage; some words acquire new meanings, and some become obsolete. While the dictionaries try to fix the meaning of words, they are only partially successful. Rape is one of the words, which seems to have changed its meaning, because of the revolution that has taken place during the last 30-40 years in the realm of human sexuality. For the vast majority of the individuals who have been on the planet earth for less than thirty years, it is difficult to visualize the trauma, the suffering and the pain associated with the word "rape," not only for the victim, but her parents, relatives and even acquaintances and strangers. No doubt, unwanted sexual intercourse did take place in the past, but it was rare enough to arouse very strong emotions and passions. It was far cry from the routine "date rape" of today. One can ask the question why?

The main reasons for the change in attitude toward sexual intercourse have been the introduction of the "pill" in the late fifties and the teaching and preaching of those who believed that pre-marital sex would improve the quality of married life, and the consequent decline of the traditional religious values of sanctity of sex and virginity. There are other reasons that are economic and cultural in nature. For example, the governments in the non-communistic world were not supposed to be directly responsible for the well being of the children in a family. There was no concept of community responsibility for bringing up the children of a mother without a husband. There were no "single parents," except in the case of a widowed mother or a widower husband. A child born out of wedlock as frowned upon as a "bastard," a word that is still used to express one's disgust and distaste.

The Canadian Federation of Students, in its publication "The Student Advocate," of September 1993, that I read only October 23, published an article entitled "Recognizing Date Rape When It Happens," written by Laura Penny. She describes two specific scenarios in which a boy is attracted to a girl reacts in a fashion that implies she likes him too; they both drink and dance, the boy takes her out of the dance hall, invites her to his apartment or room to which the girl agrees. However, she does not like the sexual intercourse that he subjects her to, and this is called "date rape."

Perhaps it should be mentioned that the human nature, in particular, the male's drive for sex, has not changed during the last few thousand years. There is a distinct difference between the roles that males and females play in the process of procreation. The male's aggressiveness is not a result of some social conditioning of a particular society. A young boy and a young girl were chaperoned in the past for the obvious reason that a boy could not be expected to be a master of his sexual impulses. The custom among the "civilized" peoples to keep most of the female body under cover, was to avoid unwanted male attraction. The use of the veil among Muslim women was initiated for similar considerations: it was not a plot to subjugate women.

The strong sexual attraction of the male towards the female is a fact of nature, and cannot be eliminated or modified without providing adequate reasons and creating circumstances conducive to postponement of the sexual act. The sanctity of sex, or sexual intercourse, was enshrined in the past, almost universally, in some form of a marriage ceremony, and the male had to make a life-long commitment to the female to satisfy his sexual needs. The concept of a family, and the permanent bondage of the male to the female, helped bring up the children, that she could not do very well on her own.

Times have changed. Today the children are permitted to have sexual intercourse without any stigma attached to it. There is no concept of waiting until marriage. The only concern is to avoid disease, and therefore, the society is willing to provide condoms in schools. For such boys, by the time they reach the age of 17 or 18 years, regular sexual intercourse must become a necessity. For those entering a university, the co-ed residences may be helpful, but they do not provide an opportunity for sexual gratification for all the male students and therefore the reason and the need for the so called "date-rape".

It is obvious that a girl who has had sexual intercourse with a large number of boys, would not suffer as a result of an unwanted sexual encounter to the same degree as a girl from whom it might be the first sexual experience. True, she might not be in a mood, or might find the act less than satisfying, but it would have to be far less traumatic than for a girl in the past who was a virgin. Today's girl has the added security that an abortionist would be only too glad to relieve her of any undesired pregnancy, without a sense of guilt on the part of either. This is in sharp contrast to what a girl had to face in the past: loss of virginity and therefore a disqualification of marriage coupled with the fear of pregnancy, and a life-long sense of shame and guilt.

For the girls who believe in the traditional religious, and consider any sexual intercourse outside the marriage a serious sin, to be punished by their God, "rape" must remain a terrifying prospect. Therefore, the girls who use the word "rape" to describe their dislike of a particular encounter in their endless sexual experiences, do a disservice to those who abide by the old traditions. While no amount of education or legal pronouncements would change the male nature, it would help, if, beside being provided with condoms, the boys were also taught that the sexual needs of girls are very different from their own. Of course, the girls should be taught that while hugging and kissing might be pleasant and adequate experiences for them, they are simply a prelude to sexual intercourse for the boys, and cannot be carried on indefinitely. When a boy invites a girl to his bedroom, especially after meeting her for the first time, she should consider it as an invitation for sexual intercourse. And, if a promiscuous girl becomes a victim of an unwanted sexual experience, it would be more reasonable for her to demand some monetary compensation for her inconvenience or discomfort, rather than express moral outrage, or try to arouse emotional response in others of the kind that the word rape evoked in yesteryears.

play such a violent sport with a bunch of ignorant thugs. I imagine that if I hadn't questioned my sexual orientation and not started to become aware, I may not have seen these boys as thugs, but as heroes and would have jumped at the chance to play football. Needless to say, I turned him down and opted for being a soccer goalie and a racket player (much more civilized sports). I suspect that if I were straight, I actually would enjoy those homecoming and frosh week football games; as it stands, I don't.

As a naive student in high school, I was ignorant of the arts. I never saw a play, the symphony, an opera, a musical, an art exhibit, etc. unless it was put on by the school - and even then, I usually didn't attend. I think my awareness to some degree allowed me to venture out beyond the expectation of engineering and make an effort to see theatre, art, music, etc. that many of my straight counterparts did not attend. It I hadn't been gay, I would not have been alienated from my peers to any degree that would make me look for entertainment elsewhere.

From looking back upon my life in the past few years, I have come to some conclusions. If I were straight, I probably not have gone to school at Queen's, or in Canada for that matter. I believe that I'd have attended a university in the Middle East and would have graduated by now in a science of some sort. I'd also probably be living with or near my parents. I'd most likely also be married - as many of the Arab Muslim men that I know who are my age are already married, some with children. I think I would, by now, be "happily" married for three years and probably have one or two children.

So as you can see, if I had been a straight man, I would be nothing like I am today. I might, on occasion, show up to class in sweat clothes and sneakers. I may never have seen a great play or a Mozart symphony. I probably would never have agreed with any lesbians about feminist theory; for that matter, I may never have met an out lesbian because of my extreme homophobia (except for Julia of course, she's everywhere). So I guess, to answer the question "Could I have been straight?" I'd have to say no because if I were straight, there would be nothing left of what I am today to call 'I'. Basil could be straight, but what makes up Basil in 1993 could not possibly make a straight Basil.

After the Montreal Massacre: Men and the White Ribbon Campaign

Four years have now passed since Marc Lepine entered an engineering classroom at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal and killed fourteen women because, in the words of his suicide note, he wanted to "send the feminists who have always ruined my life to their Maker." Since that day, Canadian women and men have reacted with varying degrees of concern and action. Initial responses in the days after the Montreal Massacre were ones of shock and horror at the single-minded determination with which Lepine carried out his attack.

Men as well as women responded to the massacre, and to its characterization as an act of violence against women in particular. The Toronto Star reported that in the aftermath of the massacre, call-in shows were flooded with calls from men who felt they had been unfairly lumped in the same category as Lepine, a man who they considered to be psychotic, a crazy person. These men rejected the feminist analysis of the event, which said that the shooting had been symptomatic of a wider social problem, and that Lepine was just acting out the disdain which many men felt toward successful women and feminists.

However, there was also a wide segment of Canadian men who used the massacre in Montreal as an opportunity to get involved in the fight against sexism and violence against women. The White Ribbon Campaign was conceived of as a way for men to voice their repudiation of violence against women in Canada. Although some men's groups were actively involved in this arena before Dec. 6, 1989, many more have come into being since then. The men's movement became a recognized phenomenon, aided by media coverage and the publication of Iron John, a book on the movement by Robert Bly.

The men's movement has been criticized,

"Dec. 6 is really a time for women to process the pain"

however, for deflecting attention away from the efforts of women to combat violence and misogyny. These criticisms encompass a number of issues. First, it has been argued that women had been fighting the causes and mopping up after the effects of misogyny for decades before the Montreal massacre, and had never received the kind of attention that these men's groups have been generating in the media.

In addition, prominent politicians and public figures, including Brian Mulroney and Jean Chretien, have donned white ribbons and expressed their support for the campaign. But some women's groups have questioned their commitment to its goals. While it is encouraging to see that men are willing to state their opposition to violence publicly, more than just a symbolic gesture is needed to make a substantive difference in the lives of victims of violence.

Deb Greer of Kingston Interval House echoes these concerns. She says that "it would be fine with me if [the politicians] actually cared ... but just wearing the 'ribbon du jour' doesn't actually mean very much. She continues by urging politicians not to wear the ribbons "unless you're prepared to actually do something - money would be nice."

These comments raise an interesting question when regarding men's involvement in combating violence. Is it productive to reject any form of 'assistance' from men on this issue? Aren't these gestures important symbolically, despite their lack of accompanying concrete action? Isn't it better that men are demonstrating some concern for an issue rather than none?

I think it is possible to appreciate the actions of men in launching the White Ribbon Campaign without accepting that all men wearing white ribbons are in fact active in combating violence or indeed refrain from perpetrating violence themselves. And particularly in the case of politicians, who bear a unique responsibility for taking concrete policy steps to combat violence, the white ribbon on its own is a hollow display of tokenism. Three years ago my cynicism about this issue did not exist. But I find myself second-guessing the white ribbon now, ever since a story was recounted at the Dec 6, 1991 memorial. One of the speakers related how he had heard an engineer wearing a ribbon say that he thought it would be "a great way to pick up chicks." How many people can recount a similar experience?

Is it productive to reject any form of 'assistance' from men on this issue? Aren't these gestures important symbolically, despite their lack of accompanying concrete action?

But it's not just a matter of sincerity: the White Ribbon Campaign has also been criticized for diverting scarce funds from groups who have a history of providing support and services for female victims of violence. Greer identifies this as a problem with the White Ribbon Campaign, in that while its office in Toronto was solvent enough to hire a number of full time staff, "women's shelters are notoriously underfunded."

But after discussing men's involvement in combating violence with Dr. Johnny Yap, a member of the Kingston Men's Project for Change, I feel as though there are viable options for men who want to help, and that there are men who want to take advantage of these options. For the past two years, the KMPC has decided to opt out of the White Ribbon Campaign. Yap cited the concerns raised by Greer as some of the reasons why his group has channelled their energies into other programs, such as offering childcare during Dec. 6 memorial activities and holding an educational forum for men to discuss their feelings about Dec. 6. He remarked, "Dec. 6 is really a time for women to process the pain" associated with remembering the massacre in Montreal.

This points to an interesting question: what can men do? Are their hands tied in terms of participating in events commemorating Dec. 6? Yap said there are plenty of things men can do as long as they don't insist on getting 'credit' for their efforts. He says, "men co-opt work that women have done [or are doing] - we don't take efforts proactively to give credit to women for the work they have done." He emphasized the delicate balancing act that confronts men's groups - on the one hand, they want to encourage men to make changes in their daily lives that will combat sexism, but they must also be conscious of the fact that these small changes are really "nothing special" when put into a larger societal context.

Yap delved further into the kinds of responsibilities men have when dealing with the issue of violence against women. He pointed out that "men are in a privileged position to define what violence is," and in contributing to the dialogue in the aftermath of the Montreal massacre, they should be careful not to take advantage of their privilege.

The backlash against feminists which has occurred since the massacre is in large part a reaction to what some men perceive as the rise of a feminist orthodoxy and an increased threat to men's status. Queen's University was not immune from this backlash: in a Toronto Star story on Dec 13, 1990, just a year after the massacre, Queen's engineering students expressed hostility towards the efforts of feminists who had tried to mark the one year anniversary. Stephane Germain, a third-year engineering physics student, was quoted as saying, "sometimes I feel that a lot of the people who are taking this up as a

"it would be fine with me if they [the politicians] actually cared ... but just wearing the 'ribbon du jour' doesn't actually mean very much."

feminist cause don't really care about the people who were shot, they're more concerned about sensational opportunities for their cause."

At the very least, however, we can say that the Montreal Massacre has increased awareness and prompted public and private debate on the issue of violence against women and sexism in general. In an informal survey of newspaper stories about violence against women, I found that coverage of the issue was low to non-existent before the event.

In spite of all the problems associated with 'letting men in' to the dialogue on violence, it seems fruitless to shut them out when they are the primary perpetrators of the violence in the first place.

Now, at least every December, the Canadian media provides some coverage.

It's tragic that 14 women had to be murdered by a woman-hater before society could even begin to come to grips with its sexism, but on the other hand I certainly am glad that the dialogue has begun. As Yap said, "one incident of history has fleshed out the essential issues" which we as men and women must face. In spite of all the problems associated with 'letting men in' to the dialogue on violence, it seems fruitless to shut them out when they are the primary perpetrators of the violence in the first place. Nevertheless, we must keep our goals in focus. Rather than trying to assuage their guilt or reassure themselves that they bear no responsibility for the pain women feel on Dec. 6 and throughout the year, men must work to eliminate the violence which women encounter, and to make women's lives and relationships with men and each other safer and more secure.

Everyday Acts to Combat Misogyny

Many people can't see the connection between the 14 women who were killed on Dec. 6, 1989 and the rise of misogyny in our culture. They say that the massacre was the result of one mind that was over the edge; it could never happen again; he was just an extreme case.

But isn't that the point? Neurotic people don't make things up completely, they are just more intensely affected by their surroundings. Such is the case with Marc Lepine. I am not debating the fact that he was a madman, but I am suggesting that he noticed the general misogyny and took it one step further.

So what can we do? The situation may look hopeless, as it seems that there will always be madmen. But if we eliminate the negative thoughts in the world, then potential killers won't have a catalyst for their actions. Sound idealistic? Maybe, but consider this now on a smaller scale.

On an individual basis, it isn't quite as daunting a prospect. If you are in the habit of making sexist or racist jokes, then every time you do, make a note and try to stop yourself before it happens again. If you make generalizations about a group of people, whether a group of women, a group of handicapped people, or even people in a certain degree program, consider whether it's a valid generalization, or just a prejudice.

Some words that have crept into our language, and are deemed acceptable, also add to the problem. A word such as "mankind" is considered acceptable, yet it makes women disappear. If you are aware of the impact of such words, don't automatically assume others know as well. Let them know you don't agree with their use.

These seem like simplistic solutions to the problem, but strangely enough they work. Try it, just once, and see what the result is. It's been said a hundred times, but if you're not part of the solution, then you're part of the problem. If you don't act to change what others are saying, then the next potential madman will still observe misogyny around him, and act accordingly.

The deaths of these 14 women were senseless, but that doesn't mean they can't point us towards change.

As Sisters We Stand

It's dark,
I feel
alone.
It's cold
I feel defeated.
It's wet,
I want to sit.
My feet are drenched,
I continue to stand.
I cannot see but I can feel there's someone in front of me.
There's someone behind me.
They are not strangers.
We are comfortable together.
We know each other's pain,
we know each other's suffering.
We know each other's pasts and presents.
There is a dim light in the distance,
I can faintly see,
I am surrounded by sisters.
It's still cold
But I feel strong.
It's still wet
but I want to stand and run and jump
for we are together.
As the numbers grow
Our parade turns into an army.
We are uniting against their will.
The cold gets colder.
The wet gets wetter.
The light flickers but can't be put out.
We are strong.
We take each other's hands preparing for what's to come.
We know we are in this together.
The sacrifice is small.
The price is low.
We are sisters
And as sisters we stand.

Poor Little Maggie

Little Maggie is a ten year sexy girl —
— sexy she strives to be!
Helpless, yet so secure of her figure.
Little Maggie
clings her infant fingers through wild golden hair, to portray sensuality and desire.
Maggie balances body and soul,
As a goddess, a magazine whore.

Poor little Maggie, looking through the door glass glances at a screaming child, hanging from a fat sweaty mother:
"Like that I will not be!"
Angel Maggie
Dances dreams and glamour, through a life that the Sun will see,
The Sun will see,
The Sun will see...

Maggie is a clay sculpture
Endlessly managed, meticulously finished!
She is in the pulpit,
waiting to be tagged and priced,
valued accordingly.
Maggie is so sure
so femininely perfect.
Smiles and whispers,
Her womanly love is pure!
Maggie, Maggie
Poor little Maggie
Who told you it would be?
I saw your destiny, but yet...
They purposely handed you the golden chalice but the wine was vinegar.
"Why?" — you ask me.
"Why, if what I did was to be, just the way it was supposed to be?"

To the Abuser, from the Abused

Behold,
here I am
I have nothing left of me that I must protect.
You can take every piece of me use me all you want
I can pretend, I can fake it
I will respond.
If you want anything from me
I can give it
I have nothing left to lose if you tell me that I am worthless, heartless, soulless, slutty,
I can listen
may even believe it but can not change
now that I am naked before you.
If you order me to do something act a certain way
I can do so for you,
but I still stand,
I still live.
I no longer hurt
I have hurt enough as it is,
I may have been bleeding before,
but now the bleeding has stopped either I have run out of blood, or no one else can wound me
you cannot wound me anymore.

You only have to decide for yourself
if you accept me, or reject me,
I can even die by your command...
the power is in your hands either way you gain nothing for I am nothing
you must live with that,
for the rest of time.
For the rest of time, I am your conscience
I am your worst nightmare,
I am the burden that would not go away.
A creation by your own free will, rest in peace, if you can.

Eclectic erotica great for rainy days

The Girl Wants To Edited by Lynn Crosbie
Coach House Press
$19.95
208 pgs.

Erotica. A word that conjures up a multitude of images of passions often considered forbidden and better left behind closed doors. Lynn Crosbie's The Girl Wants To, a tasteful collection of multi-media representations of women "struggling to carve their identities as powerful, speaking subjects in the arena of sexuality," allows the reader to cross the threshold into other worlds of sensual preference. From heterosexuality, lesbianism and prostitution, to more unusual, secretive obsessions such as necrophilia, this book provides a liberating indulgence for dull, rainy days.

Kathy Acker's "New York City in 1979" depicts the stark realities of women living and working on the streets. One of those women is Janey, a New York city hooker who has become frigid after continually being sexually hurt. She no longer believes in love. Sex is her coping mechanism by which she shuts down the channels of feeling. Sex is her independence, although she considers it a "prison" which entraps her, and a "product" for capitalist consumers to purchase.

One uniquely twisted story saturated with the macabre is a necrophiliac's confessional in Barbara Gowdy's "We Seldom Look on Love." Told in a touchingly honest voice, the protagonist candidly reveals her addiction to a sensual pleasure she rationally knows is not normal, but has come to accept and has "found no replacement for the torrid serenity of a cadaver."

"True obsession depends on the object's absolute irresponsiveness," she admits. By falling in love with dead men she has had her "heart broken by many cadavers." Involved in a different kind of love triangle, she notes her nocturnal escapades to the mortuary where she performs dancing rituals before straddling her recently deceased lovers. With longing she recalls "the heat of my body which I cooled by lying on top of cadavers" and "making love to corpses, absorbing their energy, and blazing it back out" to her living boyfriend.

Another strange tale of obsession written in a lighter tone reminiscent of the 1950s Cleaver-esque Home is Girl the Galaxy Girl's "For the Love of a Good Toaster." When June's latest home-shopping purchase, a streamlined blender, arrives hand-delivered by a goggled, mouth-flashed postman, she wastes no time in breaking it in, so to speak. In her kitchen, well-equipped with the latest gadgets, she enthusiastically prepares a plush bed of oven mitts atop the chrome counter. Here June sits with the blender between her legs, gradually testing the "whip, frappe, blend and puree" buttons as she builds up a storm of rising ecstasy.

Sensuality and language are closely connected in Rebecca Brown's beautifully sensual "Isle of Skye." Saturated with emotion in an intimate, first-person voice, this poignant tale is imbued with a woman's longing as she recalls her affair with a woman from another country. "A physical attraction can last a long time when you don't know what a person is saying to you," recalling the difficulties she encountered speaking different languages with the trusty aid of her Berlitz. Desire was instead expressed in other ways. "Our needs come from our bodies," she reflects. They taught each other "words for body parts" as well as creating their own words.

Closely resembling Neruda's "Body of a Woman," Skye's images softly blend landscapes of countryside and body. "I travel the cities from your knees to your thighs. My hands find avenues and lands. This is a country road, a freeway, a round, smooth cobbled street. Your skin has deltas, soft like silk."

Crosbie's selection of heterosexual sex is just that, apparently lacking in emotional love. Makeda Silvera's "The Girl Who Loved Weddings" tells of a wedding night menage-a-trois between a woman, her cousin and new husband. In another story, Robyn Cakebread's "How to Fly," a woman describes, moment by moment, a passionate, one-night sexual encounter with a stranger.

A segment entitled "Performers" includes the lyrics of women songwriters, many of whom have played in various Toronto night-clubs. Janet Stone's "Deep Within" has straightforward lyrics: "I want to unlock all your hidden treasures and bury/ my face in your gems" and "I want you deep within my skin"; "Burn" is only slightly less blunt: "I caress my skin you're desire/ burn me/ I have ignited."

"Bitchy Bitch Gets Laid," a sickeningly humorous comic strip, may unsettle the stomach as effectively as drinking milk and lemon juice. The comic satirizes the sex-starved woman whose typical shopping spree consists of selecting hard, oblong vegetables from the local greengrocer. By answering a singles ad, she winds up with a dream date: an ugly, short and disgustingly horny, moustached-man with very bad breath. Quite literally and picturesquely this man both degrades and epitomizes males who are more concerned with satisfying their own animalistic urges than those of their partners. Explicit, close-up illustrations of the rendez-vous grossly demonstrate typical foreplay manoeuvres and the sexual act itself.

Although parts of The Girl Wants To could be considered jolting, keep in mind that this is a book of erotica, not an ordinary romantic novel in which a kiss or making love is considered daring. Crosbie's eclectic selection takes the reader to borders not commonly experienced, but does so in a non-offensive way. Within the wide range of women's experience, lesbian and heterosexual desire are considered equally valid, making the book appealing to a variety of tastes. Beautifully written prose entices the reader, stirring up emotions and sexual appetites like feasting upon smoked oysters before a meal. One can almost taste certain scrumptious stories. Then, suddenly, the reader is jarred by vivid sexual lingo or explicit photographs, alluring one into the imaginative realms of forbidden ecstasy. Hormones are energized, perhaps even arousing the dormant ones in a woman satisfied with the sweet simplicity of celibacy.

Three banners highlight fall season

SPORTS TERM IN REVIEW

BY FRANK DIXON
The Queen's Journal

Fall has been filled with surprise events. This report will focus on varsity teams which have completed their seasons.

Football falls flat

The football Gaels entered the 1993 season as defending national champions. With All-Canadian tailback Brad Elberg unexpectedly returning, many people figured Queen's would repeat, or seriously challenge for another title. It was not to be. Queen's missed the playoffs for the first time in 17 years, with a 2-5 record, and lost all four games at home. What happened? Many key players graduated, opponents prepared more thoroughly, and injuries hurt. But most importantly, the Gaels didn't play well, as virtually everything they tried came up just short.

Elberg was lost for the season in the fourth game, seriously damaging the running attack. Not a single rushing touchdown was scored by a Queen's running back, and the Gaels repeatedly had great difficulty reaching the endzone after driving deep into enemy territory. The defense made only four interceptions in seven games, compared to 22 last year, and special teams were plagued with inconsistency. However, defensive coordinator Bob Mullen won the Gino Fracas Award as the CIAU's top volunteer assistant coach.

The Second XV, building a dynasty of their own (just three losses in seven years), capped an undefeated season by thumping Carleton to win the Seconds' championship. At season's end, opponents once again had to concede Queen's rugby stood tallest.

Total tennis triumph

The women's tennis Gaels, coached by John McFarlane, had a simply smashing season. Not only did they win the OWIAA team championship banner, but Queen's swept both the singles and doubles gold medals as well. Finishing the regular season in second place only made the Gaels hungrier for the OW team finals. Queen's beat McMaster 6-3 in first-round matches to set up a championship tilt with Western. In the final showdown, atrocious line calls by some Western players forced the Gaels to appeal for umpires, but the Mustangs' cheating couldn't forestall Queen's win.

The individual championships also showcased the Gaels' golden touch. Bali Athwal capped her unbeaten season with a 6-1, 6-1 starting in midseason, earned men's soccer all the way to the CIAU tournament in Nova Scotia. Heroic goalkeeping by rookie Liam Stevenson, a nearly impenetrable defense, and nervy performances in penalty shootouts formed the Gaels' winning formula. After finishing the regular season in fourth place in the OU East, the Gaels knocked out #2-ranked Carleton in a shootout. That led to a match with #3-ranked Toronto, where Queen's triumphed 2-0 in overtime on goals by Ken Butler and Dan Cheney. Next came the OU final game against Western. It was tied 1-1 after 90 minutes, then Jon Soler powered the Gaels to the nationals when he notched a sudden-death penalty.

At the CI's, Queen's was hampered by injuries and poor field conditions. A scoreless draw with St. Francis Xavier was followed by losses to eventual champ Sherbrooke and bronze medalist Western. However, the young Queen's squad and head coach John Walker Sr. can hold their heads high after their season to remember.

thrashing of York's #1 in the final. In the doubles final, Athwal teamed with Pam Lewis to beat Western in the final: 6-4, 6-7, 6-1.

Soccer's shocker squad

It was surprising. It was shocking. It was the Gaels' first OUAA soccer championship since 1975.

A remarkable 11-game unbeaten streak, perly to wind up with the team silver. Event golds were scored in the lightweight doubles and the heavyweight singles. The men finished in fifth place overall, with the highlight a silver in the heavyweight doubles.

Men's tennis was ranked #1 in Ontario for much of the season, and went into the team finals as one of the favourites. The Gaels wound up in third place at the OU team tournament, following a 5-2 match win over Waterloo. Five players qualified for the OU individual finals. Men's waterpolo started the season very strongly. But they could not maintain their pace, finishing up in fifth place and missing the playoffs.

Frank Tindall 1908-1993

Queen's people round the world were saddened by Frank Tindall's death on Oct. 5. Tindall was a truly remarkable man who served Queen's athletics brilliantly, as a coach, professor, and leader, for more than a quarter century. Perhaps no one in Queen's history had more impact on the university community.

Among his many honours and achievements: All-America in basketball, CFL All-Star and Hall-of-Famer, coach of the 1968 Gaels' Vanier Cup team and of Queen's only basketball champions, the John Orr Award, and an honorary Doctorate of Laws. The Frank Tindall Trophy for CIAU coaches, Frank Tindall Field, and the Frank Tindall basketball tournament are but some of the marks he left behind.

Tindall exuded class and inspired admiration, friendship and loyalty in all those fortunate to know him. He will be missed, but never forgotten.

Prodigious performances

Several other Gaels teams made strong showings. The golf team finished a consistent season by placing third at the OU finals. Gord Percy won the silver medal after losing a sudden-death playoff.

Both men's and women's cross-country teams qualified impressively for the CIAU finals in Halifax, where they each finished in fifth place. Judy Elfassy ended 12th to lead the women, while captain Todd Jones was the men's best at 13th. Solid performances during the season included the Western, Lehigh, Laurentian, and Waterloo Invitationals. Jeff Brisson and David Scott-Thomas won OW Coach-of-the-Year honours.

A late-season surge allowed the field hockey Gaels to qualify for the OW's. Queen's lost a heartbreaker to Western on sudden-death penalty strokes, but rallied strongly to beat Guelph 3-0 and finished fifth in the OW.

The women's soccer team was ranked as high as third in the country in late October. But disaster struck at the OW's in Windsor. After a first-round win, the Gaels lost to upstart McMaster and missed a chance at the CIAU's, winning the bronze. However, coach Dave McDowell won OW and CIAU Coach-of-the-Year.

Rowing Gaels went international with visits to prestigious regattas in Rochester and Boston. At the OW's, the women raced su-

Willis spikes sexism and opponents

BY FRANK DIXON

The Queen's Journal

Brenda Willis sees herself as a volleyball coach who coaches athletes, NOT male athletes. She is the award-winning coach of the nationally-ranked Queen's Golden Gaels men's volleyball team—the only female head coach of a men's university volleyball coach in the country. Willis also led the Ontario Junior men's Provincial team to the gold medal at last summer's Canada Games in Kamloops, B.C.

But despite national recognition from fellow coaches and athletes alike, every so often there comes a reminder that some people consider her out of place, coaching a men's team.

"A few seasons ago, I was organizing the first practice of the year for the Gaels," Willis remembered. "Half an hour before it started, I walked into the gym and saw a young man I hadn't met before. Here's what happened."

Prospect: "Who's the volleyball coach?"

Willis: "That's me."

Prospect: "No, I mean the men's coach."

Willis: "I am the men's coach."

Prospect: "F--- off!"

"Practice started on schedule, and this guy did show up," Willis continued. "But when he saw that I was in fact the coach, right away he looked like he had somewhere else he had to be, real fast. After we warmed up and did a few laps, he was gone."

It appears this Queen's student (the guilty shall remain nameless) assumed because Willis is a woman, she was automatically excluded from being the coach of the Gaels' men's team.

However, assumptions of that sort simply won't work for any of Queen's opponents. At press time, the 1993-94 Gaels had a 5-1 win-loss record in the OUA East, and went into last weekend's play ranked first in Ontario and ninth in Canada.

Willis is now in her seventh season coaching the Gaels. In that time she has won two OUA East Coach-of-the-Year awards (1989-90 and 1991-92), a 1992 Coaching Excellence award sponsored by the 3M Company, and a 1991 Special Achievement award from the Ontario Ministry of Tourism and Recreation. Under her direction, Queen's has improved every season, and is now knocking on the door of the elite university teams in Canada.

"I got into coaching boys almost by accident," Willis said. "I liked it, and decided to stay with it. Without using stereotypes, I find that young male athletes are ego-driven, but I enjoy dealing with that. The men's game at the university level is oriented towards offense, and very aggressive. It suits my style well."

Willis has succeeded at Queen's by working with the school's broad-based, academics-first sports ideology. She takes pride in the four Academic All-Canadians from her 1992-93 roster of 15 players, including Jenkins Trophy co-winner Kevin Graham. The Academic All-Canadian designation is awarded to CIAU varsity athletes who achieve first-class academic standing, while the Jenkins goes to the graduating male athlete who best combines athletic and academic success.

"I try to teach my athletes to focus entirely on the task at hand, and develop skills at compartmentalizing their lives," Willis said. "They compete hard, study hard, and party hard, when the time comes for that."

Still, it can be a real challenge building a competitive team with only 5 3/4 hours of practice time per week, which is all the Gaels get because of limitations in available gym time. The York Yeomen, who are shaping up as Queen's main rival for a CIAU berth this season, get 15 1/2 hours in the gym every week.

But Willis is excited about her current team, which will return every player next season. David Kantor looks like a potential national team player, a few years down the road. The Gaels are very good now, and they should get even better in the near future.

In a 1992 interview with TSN, Willis said she sees herself as a volleyball coach first. She urged women to go after what they want to do — "don't let stereotypes stand in your way."

Some feminists will undoubtedly say Willis is selling out because they think she should be coaching women to help women. Her answer to this is that she is a good role model for others, doing what she's doing now. "It's telling women that they don't have to limit themselves to just coaching women," Willis explained. "They can expand their horizons."

Expanding her horizons certainly goes with the territory for Willis, and the Golden Gaels are sure to benefit because of it.

The Queen's Journal

Over the past two weeks the men's volleyball team has been extremely busy.

The November 20th weekend they were part of a 16-team single-elimination tournament at the University of Guelph.

In the first round Queen's (4 & 0 in regular season East division play at the time) and McMaster (also 4 & 0 in the West) met in what one might consider curious seeding. Mac's setter Andreas Schum ran an incredible offense, keeping the Queen's blockers off guard with double quicks and lots of combinations. The Gaels played well at times but eventually lost 3 games to 1 (15-9, 9-15, 12-15, 12-15). That put the Gaels in the consolation side of the draw where they proceeded to win 3 straight matches, defeating Wilfred Laurier, (3-2), Laurentian (3-0), and Lewis College of Chicago (3-1). So the Gaels, in pursuit of Gold, settle for consolation Gold. According to Coach Brenda Willis, the Lewis match was the highest level match the Gaels have played this season. She offered particular praise to setter Kevin Chiswell who ran a very smooth and effective offense.

On November 26th the Gaels played host to the Ryerson Rams in an OUA regular season match. Willis used this match against the 0-4 Rams to give valuable experience to several younger players. Although the Gaels passing started out on shaky ground, causing them to fall behind in the first set 9-3, they settled down after their first time-out and came back to win 15-11, 15-5, and 15-11. Setter Chris Young showed great composure through the early parts of the match, when the team wasn't passing well, and once things settled down he put together a very fluid offense. Rookie Paul Porvin and Captain Ron O'Hare led the Gaels outside attack with kill percentages over 60. Mike Spence, Mark "Prior" McKenna, and David Kantor each chipped in 5 kills and 3 blocks. This win put the Gaels at the top of the East with a 5 & 0 record, but with the tough stuff still to come.

Sunday November 28th the tri-colour squad headed down to T.O. to face the Yeomen (also 5 & 0) at York, in one of their greatest sea-saw battles ever. The Gaels came out like gangbusters, jumping to an 8-1 lead before York could get anything going. It looked like someone shut the door suddenly as the Gaels couldn't put anything together — coming out on the bottom end of a 15-8 loss. They quickly regrouped and came back to take

Synchro sweeps figure meet

BY SARAH GORDON

The Queen's Journal

In the early hours of Sunday morning on Nov 21, Queen's synchro swimming team look off to take over the meet at U of T.

Chanda Reid, a novice swimmer, rose to fifth position. Rookie novices Julie Hollick and Michelle Goecke placed a solid 23 and 26 out of 30 total swimmers.

Intermediates shone with Michelle Brooks in second place, Laura Scull in third place, and Anita Bapooji in ninth out of 22 competitors.

Senior girls performed strongly to gain high rankings: Sarah Dunstall placed third, Leila Myers fourth, Rachel Thompson in fifth, and Sarah Thompson in ninth out of a total of twelve swimmers.

This excellent performance can be attributed to the numerous hours of tedious practice under the critical eyes of head coach Nicole Scheidl and assistant coaches Ida Stegena and Jen Chown. Watch for team and duet performances in the spring term.

the second set 15-11 and the third 15-4. The Gaels were ahead 6 to 2 in game 4 and appeared to be in control when things began to change. In very high level "high" contest, the Gaels went down 15-11 and 15-12.

A very disappointed Coach Willis attributed a big part of the change in momentum to unforced errors. According to Willis, both teams had been playing quite well throughout the fourth and fifth sets with the lead changing hands at least six times before the outcome was decided. The Gaels have an chance to go even with the Yeomen before the Christmas Break as they host not only their final game of the fall schedule this Friday at 8 p.m., but also their last regular season home game. The York Yeomen and the Queen's Golden Gaels, both nationally ranked teams will go at it in Ross gym... there is no admission charge and the talented Gaels love to play in front of a home town crowd. Remember - tomorrow... 8 p.m. Ross gym!

The Queen's Sailing Team has moved into its second season, after almost two decades of dormancy. During the sixties and seventies, the intercollegiate sailing program in Canada was in full force, harbouring many of the top sailors in the sailing community today. Presently, there are sixty members on the team, and although only in its second season, the future of Queen's sailing looks promising.

The members train twice a week at Kingston Yacht Club, in the club's squadron boats. The team consists of students who enjoy sailing with in a group and learning from more experienced members, and racers who train in order to compete in places such as New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Maryland. Sailing in American Universities is well established, and has the status of a varsity team, creating a high level of competition. A few Canadian schools, such as Queen's have been admitted into the Middle Atlantic Intercollegiate Sailing Association (MAISA), to compete against 41 other North American Schools as a varsity team.

Queen's will be putting together an elite team next year to send to the high calibre regattas in the States. The next two seasons will be concentrated on fundraising to buy some more competitive training boats which will bring the team one step closer to qualifying for the US Nationals.

[Eds note: Sailing is an under-recognised and overachieving club which will hopefully regain Varsity status soon.]

Double defeat in overtime

BY ANDREW TURNER AND

ANDRE NOWAKOWSKI

The Queen's Journal

The men's hockey team lost two heart-breaking overtime games this past weekend to Ryerson and Laurentian. These were two games that the Gaels deserved to win as they outplayed their opponents on both occasions.

On Saturday, the Gaels met the Ryerson Rams in a tough defensive battle that saw Ryerson come away with a 3-2 overtime victory. The opening period saw great goaltending at both ends of the ice. Landry, coming off a sub-par performance was unbeatable between the pipes in the first period stopping everything fired at him. At the other end of the ice, the Queen's offense was displaying good control, especially on the power play where they had several good chances.

Near the end of the period, Robbins and Girardi both had good chances on the power play only to be curtailed by the Ryerson backstop. The best chance of the period came on a pass from Jay Lee to a molested Dan Brown who, with one hand on the stick, deflected it high over the net. The Gaels were displaying good forechecking and were controlling the puck well. However, their effort was not paying off on the scoreboard. The first period ended with no score.

The Gaels came out flying in the second period, pressing at every chance. Clark had a great opportunity coming in alone down the left side in the first minute of play, but was turned away by the Ryerson goalie. The Gaels had the puck in the Ryerson zone for almost the first four minutes but they could not put the puck in the net. The Gaels finally got burned when Derek Morin tried to pinch in to keep the attack going. Ryerson got the puck out of the zone past Morin and broke out in a two on one to score on a nice passing play; Landry had no chance on the play.

The Gaels came right back on the power play when Brown took the puck from end to end down the left wing. He faked the pass and then tipped a wrist shot to the top right hand corner over the glove of the dumbfounded goalie. It was nice to see Budgell back in the troy as he was playing his typical aggressive style of hockey and keeping the rams on their toes.

Fortunately, this week body checking was legal. Unfortunately, despite a fair amount of stick work by the Rams and no penalties, the Gaels found themselves penalized on a questionable hooking call at 17:50 against Morin. Thanks to good penalty-killing led by Lobinowich and Kantautas, the Gaels killed the Ryerson man advantage. After trading goals and some good goaltending by Landry, the second period ended 1-1.

Queen's once again hungrily hit the ice in the third, their appetite marked by an early scoring chance for Dinsmore. Just after this, at 0:34, de Verteuil received an high-sticking infraction. Ryerson was able to capitalize on the ensuing power play. The Rams converted on a good give-and-go at 2:07 to take the lead. As usual, the Gaels kept fighting and putting the heat on in the Ryerson zone. Ryerson's hot goalie kept denying the equalizer by stonewalling the Gaels, including a couple of chances by Storr. Finally, at 13:17, a faceoff in the Rams end saw the puck come back to the point. Storr was able to keep it in and he fired the puck at the net. Patrolling the front of the net, to no one's surprise, was Budgell who deflected it past the Ryerson goalie.

Landry continued to play well, stopping a short-handed opportunity in the last five minutes as the power play failed to click. With time running out, Gosselin had a great chance to end the game with less than ten seconds remaining, but was unable to beat the Rams netminder.

With the score tied 2-2 after regulation the Gaels were headed into a five minute overtime period.

Without a doubt, the Gaels were looking for the win as they thoroughly dominated overtime. Indeed, with less than a minute to play, it appeared the Gaels had scored the winning goal. With the puck lying in the crease after a Lobinowich chance close in left the goalie lying in the net, Clark followed the play up and put it past the beaten goalie.

Unbelievably, the referee had whistled the play dead despite not having lost the sight of the puck for the standard three seconds. The following faceoff saw Ryerson catch the Gaels flatfooted as they moved the puck into the Queen's zone and slide it past a startled Landry at 4:29. For his usual intimidating style of play, Budgell was named the Gaels MVP of the game.

Laurentian 7, Queen's 6

On Sunday, the Laurentian Voyageurs came out flying with two quick goals — both in the first four minutes of the game. The Gaels were being outplayed and out hustled. The wake-up call came from captain Brown when, on the power play, he rifled a low slapshot past a screened Laurentian goalie.

With Derek Morin not playing, the Gaels were outsized and thus needed to play a physical, disciplined game. The Gaels rose to the challenge and tied the game up near the end of the period when Kantautas unselfishly fed the puck to a wide open Brown who redirected the puck into the unguarded net.

The Gaels took the momentum into the second frame with two goals in the first five minutes to go ahead 4-2. The third Gaels goal came on a pretty wrap around backhand by Mueggler set up by Dinsmore. The fourth Gaels goal came on a spirited effort by Andrew Clark, who was stopped on a partial break-away but kept with the play to pick up the puck again and then finally score on his third effort after a scramble in front.

The Gaels were playing well, controlling the puck and out hustling the opposition. Then at 14:08, the Voyageurs scored after a point shot was put past Landry that was arguably kicked in. After two periods of play, the Gaels were ahead 4-3.

Once again, the Gaels started the third off intensely as they looked to widen the margin. Led by the line of Girardi, Clark and Gosselin, the Gaels looked strong. But it was Laurentian who scored first in the period when a quick snapshot from the top of the right faceoff circle beat Landry on the blocker side. Just over a minute later, the Gaels regained the lead as Brown moved in from the point to join the play. Brown slid the puck over to Girardi who had no problem finding the open net at 8:37.

At 9:57, a failure to clear the zone cost the Gaels the lead as the rebound from a point shot was shoved past Landry. A scant seven seconds later, Laurentian scored again on a wrist shot from just inside the left point that beat Landry over the shoulder, after winning the draw at centre ice. Despite this turn of events, the Gaels attack did not relent. They pulled the goalie at 18:34 with the draw deep in the Laurentian zone. The Voyageurs iced the puck and there was another faceoff in the Laurentian zone. The manoeuvre paid off as Girardi set Clark up with a nice feed. Clark, left alone in front of the net, made no mistake as he tied the game. The Gaels headed into their second overtime in as many games.

There were a few opportunities for the Gaels in the extra frame, most notably the line of Fenton, Bucher, and Budgell. However, a defensive lapse allowed Mike O'Neill of the Voyageurs to walk in alone and he put it somewhat weakly past Landry at 3:59. Girardi was named game MVP in the losing cause.

Intramural season in review

BY ROB CAMP
The Queen's Journal

Another successful Intramural season has come and gone.

Competition was high, providing for a lot of exciting action in the gyms and on the fields.

BEWIC - COED SPORTS

BEWIC competition was tight, and those pesky 'Moose', although not victorious, just wouldn't quit. The year started off with some exciting play on the diamond. Emotional Ketchup Burst not only walked away with the touney but also the first ever BEWIC Championship T-shirts. Con-Ed downed Loose Moose in Intramurals first ever Frisbee Ultimate tournament. This event was a great success and we anticipate it to be a popular event at Queen's. Moving to the arena, Con-Ed iced Loose Moose in the curling bonspiel final while the Moose were swept yet again, this time by Rehab for the broomball championship.

To the more traditional sports, Mark Zucker and Jacqui Wong won the tennis tournament which was unfortunately plagued by bad weather. The first volleyball tournament of the year was won by Vertically Challenged. In the second tournament, there were two divisions. Ice Pack edged out Vertically Challenged in the competitive division, while the Smashing Mohawks walked away with the Rec title. All other league sports are still in progress and standings were not available.

WIC - WOMEN'S SPORTS

With the end of the fall term approaching, many of the fall WIC sports have finished for the season or are into playoffs. In completed sports, PHE leads the way with championships in dodgeball, soccer and the swimathon. Meds came out ahead in both the jogathon and skateathon. The flag football league suffered from numerous defaults (more numerous than games played) and eventually ended with a decisive victory by Grads over Arts '94 in the final. Arts '96 skated away with an impressive win over Engineering in the ringette final despite playing short-handed for the entire game. PHE won the team title in the harrier cross-country race, with Carolyn Russel of Engineering crossing the finish line for the individual victory. The short water-basketball season wrapped up with Rehab downing the short-handed Education team in the final. Basketball, floor hockey, and both volleyball leagues are all in playoffs (check the board for eligibility and game times) and the tennis and badminton tournaments are also winding down.

BEWS - MEN'S SPORTS
The race to be top dog in the BEWS Standings have taken a hairpin turn as the crowding continues at the top. The most recent event results has caused the top five teams to be almost as close as Marky Mark and his underwear (but a damn sight more palatable to look at). With Rehab dragging Meds along like a broken leg the unit has inched ever closer to the end of term leader PHE. What with big wins in Flag Football and a close finish in Soccer the gap has narrowed to minuscule proportions. Following these teams closely is last years champion Mining and the mixed unit of ConEd/Education who have some strong teams in the remaining sports. Rounding out the top five are the underdog Comm 95 team who seem to be about a year away from dominance.

The Rehab men took championships in flag football, the softball tournament and tug of war. Rehab combined with Meds also clinched the title at the annual track and field meet. In bewsball, Con-Ed dodged their way to victory. Con-Ed/Education got another win in the harrier cross-country race. In other field sports, Law took home the championship in Rugby play while Arts '94 battled their opponents as well as the elements to capture the soccer championship. In golf action, J. Bloomer of Comm '94 came away with the team victory. P. Murton of Education rung up the victory in horseshoes. The tennis season came to end with M. Zucker and B. Kwon taking the doubles crown.

Good-luck to all teams in the playoffs. Schedules for next term will be posted on the Intramural bulletin boards prior to the Christmas break. Managers and participants are encouraged to check the schedules to find out when their first winter games are scheduled, as league play starts first day back.

Campion finds the key to movie magic

The Piano
Directed by Jane Campion
Capitol
BY IAN PETRIE
The Queen's Journal

A muddly quagmire exists at the fringes of empire, home to an isolated and insecure British population. This is nineteenth-century New Zealand, the provocative setting of The Piano, the fine new film from writer-director Jane Campion (Sweetie, An Angel at My Table).

Ada (Holly Hunter), an inscrutable mute Scotswoman, and her daughter Flora (Anna Paquin) are deposited on a remote beach, to await the arrival of Stewart (Sam Neill), the husband arranged for her by her father. Prominent among the possessions strewn along the sand is Ada's piano, which is her chosen means of expression.

Stewart, a land-obsessed pakeha (white man), is immediately disillusioned with his odd bride. Conversely, Gaines (Harvey Keitel), a maligned figure caught between English and Maori life, is smitten, and arranges to trade Stewart a piece of land for his wife's piano (literally, her voice).

Gaines, fully aware of the importance Ada attaches to the instrument, strikes a bargain with her; she can earn back the piano, key by key, by granting certain favours while she plays. Do not, however, associate this beginning with such morally bankrupt productions as Honeymoon in Vegas and Indecent Proposal. Campion's fine script develops complex relationships between the characters (Flora included) and explores Ada's agency in quite surprising ways. The Piano is probing, often ambiguous and deeply disturbing by design.

The cast is simply marvellous. Previous directors (the Coen brothers, Raising Arizona; James L. Brooks, Broadcast News) have used Hunter's petite frame to emphasize her feistiness. Here, her smallness wonderfully evokes Ada's withdrawn nature, serves to emphasize the closeness of mother and daughter, and stands in stark contrast to the physicality of Keitel and Neill. Hunter carries the film with her eyes and gestures.

Keitel, for his part, seems only to get better with age, The Piano being one of several films contributing to the renaissance of his career. Keitel's craggy features are enormously suggestive, capturing Baines's world-weariness and the air of innocence that he maintains amidst degradation. As in Bad Lieutenant, Keitel doffs his clothes, revealing a body seemingly comprised of lumps of clay (which isn't meant to be pejorative).

It is only appropriate that music is an integral component of the film. Hunter plays the piano pieces herself, indeed composer Michael Nyman shaped the music around her range and abilities. The resultant score is haunting. The Piano is also visually stunning. Campion and cinematographer Stuart Dryburgh shoot in a dynamic, indeed organic, style which uses the rugged beauty of New Zealand to full advantage.

The Piano is, quite simply, one of the finest films of the year. Alternately touching and disturbing, tender and brutal, overt and understated, it is thoroughly beguiling.

How many keys is that? Harvey Keitel caresses Holly Hunter.

A band full of Moxy

Moxy Fruvous
Stages
BY PETE HARRIS
The Queen's Journal

What is a 'Fruvous', anyway? This question had to be answered. Of all the places to seek definition, Stages seemed an unlikely place to find some sort of answer. The hope was that it would somehow involve the giant disco ball looming over the dance-floor.

Moxy Fruvous and Jann Arden played to a fairly large crowd on Monday night. Opening act Jann Arden came on stage with an acoustic guitar in hand and a bassist to back her up. The simplicity of her stage presence would prove to add to the charm of her song-writing.

"Nice to be here," she said, "feel free to lay down." With her rich vocals and rhythmic guitar playing, this was a good suggestion. A major portion of her songs described situations involving love. Everyone seems to sing about love, but Jann Arden keeps you fixated on her music. She is an extremely talented musician, but the venue was somewhat mismatched with her style. Her music is the type suited to a dimly lit room and candles. Stages doesn't have candles. They only have lasers. Arden and lasers? Maybe, but candles seem more appropriate.

Despite her great performance, Arden did not answer the burning question as to what a 'Fruvous' is. On top of this, she did not use the disco-ball. It would be up to the four members of Moxy Fruvous to do that.

The crowd was ready for the antics of Moxy Fruvous. Surrounded by a blend of hype and novelty, this group has steadily become a big part of the Canadian independent music scene. Their Kingston stop was one of their last dates in a two month Canadian tour. The key to their success lies in their live performances. Mixing wit, improvisation and impressive harmonies, you would have to be trying really hard not to smile and enjoy their show.

Moxy Fruvous seem to absorb the elements of our pop culture, twist them around and throw them into a satirical portrait of reality. Either that, or they are just plain silly. Whatever it is, they are at their best when they are singing "Spider-man," a twisted version of "Master of the House" from Les Miserables, or "Minnie the Moocher." Their ability to do this sort of material reveals that they can, and will, do anything they feel like covering. Of course, songs like these will never be released, but these songs let them rant and carry on during a live performance. This is what makes a Moxy Fruvous show so entertaining.

Unfortunately, it is this aspect of Moxy Fruvous' charm that is lost on their recordings.

Musically, they are extremely versatile. At one point one Fruvous was beating a suitcase to keep the rhythm (hey, it's harder than it sounds). The very next song they were a four-piece band, including drums, two guitars, and bass. This is a new side of Moxy Fruvous that has yet to be investigated. Although their musical abilities are exceptional, it is their humour that carries them. A song released as a single earlier this year, "Stuck in the 90's," was introduced during their show with serious overtones. For a few minutes, they preached about the Generation X label. It was a little too much. They are far more effective at analyzing society's problems through satirical lyrics rather than hitting their fans over the head with their message.

That damn question about a 'Fruvous' was still lingering, until finally they began to explain its definition. The only thing was that they each had a different answer. It's a growth that was found on mates during the industrial revolution ?!?! No, no. It's the last name of an escaped convict from a Kingston penitentiary in the 1950's. No, wait, it's the highest speed on an Italian blender. After these answers it was all so much clearer.

Although it had nothing to do with what a 'Fruvous' was, the band used the Stages disco-ball during their encore. They combined Lou Reed's "Walk on the Wild," Abba's "Dancing Queen," U2's "Angel of Harlem," and the disco-ball!! Absolutely incredible.

For their third encore, they decided to sing their cappella tune "The Gulf War Song" without microphones. The entire bar went quiet, except for a drunk 'Fruvous' alongside the bar. It was a superb finale to an entertaining show. Moxy Fruvous are an extremely talented group, both comically and musically, and will undoubtedly have continued success in Canadian music.

Unplugged and seated at Stages.

BOOTSAUCE SLEEPING BOOTIE POLYGRAM

Oh shit, here we go again... And so with these highly appropriate words, the third release by Montreal's Bootsauce begins.

If one considers The Brown Album as the essence of the Bootsauce sound with clever sampling, killer guitar hooks, tuneful melodies and intelligent rapping, then Sleeping Bootie can be seen as a thrice diluted version of this great formula.

Relying mostly on a slow disco sound peppered up with choral choruses and infrequent horns, the new album really has little to offer.

However, the album is mostly dull and uninspired. Even the cover of Rick Derringer's "Rock & Roll Hoochie Koo" gets standard treatment when it had potential to be great.

There was no great improvement. —STEVE CAIN RATING: C

BLUE RODEO FIVE DAYS IN JULY WEA

I must admit that when I first listened to Five Days in July, I felt a little disappointed. This is not the breakthrough album that will assure the band fame and notoriety.

Five Days breaks with that tradition. It's a slow-paced, country-ish album. Some will inevitably say that Blue Rodeo has levelled off, that this album proves them merely a good Canadian band.

Other stand-out tracks are the acoustic-based "There's Still Life," and the ambient "Deli" which employs a spoken voice sample similar to The Orb's "White Fluffy Clouds."

minutes later (yes, it's short too!) you forget what you were listening to. Nothing sticks in your head, and when you give it a serious listen you realize why.

I think there's a big eye on the cover of the album because the band is on the lookout for a new songwriter, a new vision for the future, and most of all, a new name.

The low points on the album are unmemorable stock tunes such as "Photograph," a reasonable but unexceptional country ramble, and "Til I Gain Control Again." And while "5 Days in May" is a great song, Keelor's guitar playing is unexcusably brutal.

Blue Rodeo's album is definitely worthwhile, but be forewarned that it's surprisingly mellow. Despite some filler, the superb McLachlan numbers suggest a new side to the band, a laid-back Trinity Sessions sort of groove, at which they excel. —BROCK MARTLAND RATING: A

CHAPTERHOUSE BLOOD MUSIC DEDICATED/ARISTA

With their first album, Whirlpool, Chapterhouse were lumped into the British shoegazing scene, a scene full of layered guitars that never seemed to do too much.

As Chapterhouse shows on their new album Blood Music, this fusion of sounds works beautifully well: the dreamy pop of shoegazing and the otherworldly mixes of ambient totally complement one another.

The best songs are the upbeat "She's a Vision," and the first single, "We Are the Beautiful," which includes a drum sample of Led Zeppelin's "When the Levee Breaks."

Other stand-out tracks are the acoustic-based "There's Still Life," and the ambient "Deli" which employs a spoken voice sample similar to The Orb's "White Fluffy Clouds."

All in all, this disc is a great combination of the two elements, a worthy addition to a fan of either style, and probably the best indie/dance crossover since Screamedelica.

TAO TAO

Independent/ Onion God Records

Although changing their name from Trains of Winter to Tao may not be clear to those who thought the old moniker was just fine, there is something to be said for simplicity.

That's not to say that their unique sound — often characterized by the Middle Eastern-sounding guitar work of Michael Wynn weaving its way through the frantic strumming of Andrew Pricessmith, placed on top of expressive percussion and driving bass — has been placed on the back burner, it's just that the acoustic sounds that were found on old tunes, such as "Norfolk and Western" and "Some Giant," have been replaced by a nearly hardcore punk sound as characterized by "Sponge" from this release.

In the old style, the closest on this 5-song eponymous EP is the lead track "Heirloom." Dealing with the popular topic of father/son relations, Pricessmith's lyrics and tone are harsher than most, making this exploration more moving than expected.

Also from the old days is "Resurrection," a song that originally appeared on the CKLC/ Whig-Standard Foundations of Rock CD. Not coincidentally the finest track on said compilation, this revamped version of "Resurrection" — about the re-emergence of right-wing political parties — is even more powerful in the context of the recent federal election.

Although the new song "Second Skin" adds extra elements of congas and bongos, this piece is ultimately the most disappointing on the album due to Pricessmith's strained vocals and the unimaginative song-structure.

In all, Tao is a first rate indie with professional quality production courtesy of Jamie Stewart (ex-The Cult) that adds favourably to the ast repertoire of the Trains of Winter. Hopefully, this release will give them the respect in southern Ontario and nationally they well-deserve but failed to receive in Kingston while they were here.

STEVE CAIN RATING: A

NO ALTERNATIVE VARIOUS ARTISTS ARISTA

No Alternative, the latest compilation from the Red Hot Organization (creators of Red Hot and Blue) is simply awesome. Better yet, the proceeds of the album go towards AIDS research and relief.

The massive list of contributing artists and bands includes: Matthew Sweet, Buffalo Tom, Soul Asylum, Urge Overkill, American Music Club, Goo Goo Dolls, Pavement, Smashing Pumpkins, Bob Mould, Sarah McLachlan, Uncle Tupelo, Beastie Boys, The Breeders, Sonic Youth, and a "surprise" untitled and uncredited track by Nirvana.

Since I got No Alternative, I've listened to it non-stop; I can honestly say that I really like 20 of the 21 songs of the album. The exception? I hate to admit it, but it's Patti Smith's emotional, AIDS-related loss song titled "Memorial Tribute."

Anyway, such a short review should not be spent criticizing the only "bad" song.

With such an immensity of good songs, I'm at a loss at describing why each one is worthwhile, so you might have to trust me on this. After all, No Alternative is a compilation, so even if you don't agree with me on every song, there's enough diverse material for anyone to enjoy. There's actually a somewhat pretentious introduction on the cover-slip which clarifies that there is no such thing as "alternative music"; "alternative music does not exist... it's a myth on par with Elvis sightings, quality airline food and stress-free relationships."

However, there's something to be said about the impact of stereotyping music: "We must learn that labelling music creates borders and these borders create factions... don't categorize." Hence, note that I've restrained myself from doing the "easy" thing — I haven't called anything "alternative" (although maybe I'd like to).

No alternative is simply great. Buy it because I say so, buy it to support the fight against AIDS, or buy it for that one secret, uncredited Nirvana song — I don't care. Just buy it. —SIÂN BEDDOE-STEPHENS RATING: A+

Hollywood hits the road again

Kalifornia
 Directed by Dominic Sena
 Princess Court Cinema
 BY OWIN LAMBECK
 The Queen's Journal

"I have to look beneath the cliché." These words are spoken early on in Kalifornia by Brian Kessler, a would-be author who is writing a book on America's most notorious murderers. Ironically, this is exactly what the film itself fails to accomplish. Although Kalifornia features effective suspense and good performances, it is essentially just another re-run of the road movie formula.

The first rule of a road picture is to throw people together who are complete mismatches. In this case it is two couples. Brian, played by David Duchovny (The Rapture, Chaplin) and his artsy photographer girlfriend Carrie Laughren, played by Michelle Forbes (Ensign Ro on Star Trek: The Next Generation) are anxious to get out of Kentucky and into California. The convenient hitch is that they don't have enough cash to keep their 8mpg convertible gassed up, so they advertise for a ride sharer. They end up with a couple of white trash losers, Early Grace (Brad Pitt) and Adele Corners (Pitt's former real-life girlfriend, Juliette Lewis). Early is late with the rent on their trailer and is having problems with his parole officer, so he decides it's time to hit the road. Just in case this wasn't formulaic enough, a jail record and an abusive relationship towards his girlfriend are thrown in for good measure. It is clear almost from the beginning where this movie is headed. Soon Early's violence is out of control, and Brian and Carrie have become hostages. The suspenseful, dark storyline is well supported by the humourous dialogue and lack of catchy music. (Two rare elements in the film that are not road movie clichés.) Also quite effective is the intense performance of Brad Pitt. This is his second role as a criminal in a road movie. His first was as a thief in Thelma and Louise, which was followed by roles in Johnny Suede and—most notably as the rebellious brother in A River Runs Through It. This is probably his most challenging role to date, and he comes off as frightening, complex, and believable. Brian provides a good foil for Early, questioning him continually and creating an interesting psychological

Too wet behind the ears

Moist
 The Toucan
 BY CHRISTIAN deBRUIJN
 The Queen's Journal

Drunk guy with really great looking hair. "These guys are just lacking something, man. What they need is the technique and style of a band like Chilliwack. Gino Vanelli could teach these guys something about soul!"

Me (trying to be polite by constantly nodding my head and smiling): "Yeah... yeah they could!" My new drunk friend and I continued this circular conversation for the entire night. Although I disagree with his choice of comparisons, the reasoning behind his observations was accurate. Moist was definitely lacking at this gig.

Hailing from Vancouver, Moist formed last October and have recently released their self-titled, indie-debut cassette. Having just signed a publishing deal with EMI music, keyboardist Kevin Young informed me that the band is looking for a corporate label deal. But at the same time he optimistically stated: "The main thing when we sign a record deal is that we must have control. We won't sign with anybody who doesn't believe in us, or is not going to support us." Moist have been touring across Canada for almost five months now with plans to return to Vancouver after their show at Alfie's on Tuesday night.

Ok, I promised myself I wouldn't make the comparison after listening to the first three songs... sorry I can't. Beginning with "Bitterness" and moving into "Beg" and "Push," Moist came off resembling Pearl Jam with a little funk bass guitar and (stand up!) keyboards mixed in. Lead singer David Usher was doing his best Eddie Vedder on stage and guitarist Mark Makoy gave the token and precise solos. These two often bumped into each other, and as they put it: "were trying to feed off each other's energy." Other problems with the first set was the band's cover of The Doors "Peace Frog," which actually made me long for the original. Moist's version of The Stooges "1969," I...I won't even mention.

When the second set began, the first six songs sounded exactly the same and frankly, were quite boring. "Monkey Boy," "Kill For You," and "Heany" all lacked hooks and had the same driving bass lines, guitar riffs, drum beat and vocal style. For the whole show the band was also too loud. Usher's vocals are the key to the band, although I don't like to say it, this is what is going to "sell," and drive all you Pearl Jam fans wild.

On a few numbers Moist did show promise of breaking their commercially accessible mode. On "Surf Tune," "Into Everything" and "The Shrieking Love," the band engaged a different style by blending jazz and blues elements into their songs. This made for something different and was a refreshing change from the drive that they provided for the other 22 songs. As Young told me: "We were trying to do something different and new."

Moist will be big someday, all that there is no question. They are the typical "safe alternative" (the second word used for lack of a better term) which the corporate labels want to market as something "new," "different" and "on the cutting edge," and proceed to ram down our throats on mainstream and college radio. A corporate label will probably crush the glimpse of promise that Moist showed on the songs mentioned, and force them to go with what sells. If my hypothesis comes true, look out, here comes Canada's Bad Company for the '90's.

RAMBLE ON!

BY SUE RIEDL
The Queen's Journal

It's dark. You're walking alone. Feeling nervous, your pace quickens. Suddenly your greatest fear is realized as the footsteps behind you are approaching faster as your pace increases. As a woman this is an experience that constantly looms in the back of my mind whenever I am somewhere alone, especially if night is approaching. Even when I hear the footsteps behind me turn away in another direction, there is only a split second between my sigh of relief and my immediate awareness that I was lucky - this time. My ears search the night, alert for danger once again.

We live in a society where violence against women is increasing, and especially on our minds on December 6, when we try to make sense of the horrors that took place in what has become known as the Montreal Massacre.

It is appalling to see this disturbing trend being turned into entertainment in the movies. If films are said to be a form of escapism I often wonder where we are being led. More than ever, sexual assault and rape seem to be an accepted element of narrative cinema. Violence and threat are not only used as an establishment of power, but also as a legitimate means of introducing a "romantic" scene, usually linked with sex.

But let us diverge for a moment and escape into this amusement park of the cinema. Picture the scene: a young woman leaves the diner where she works after a long night's work. She begins to walk home alone, in the dark. It's a cold and lonely night. Even a little scary perhaps? Well, never fear because just as you might be getting nervous for her safety, two men appear out of nowhere. Buddies from school apparently, and you can tell because they're really, really friendly. In fact they're so friendly they insist on walking home with her. Isn't that sweet. Not wanting to steer too far from the usual formula attack sequence, within minutes our protagonist is running for her life. Of course she cannot outrun the two pursuers and they soon catch up to her. In her struggle she manages to punch one of them in the face. Is he going to let her get away with this? (I was on the edge of my seat with anticipation.) NO WAY.

Just as the anticipated rape is about to occur she is saved by the dishboy who works in the diner with her. Turns out he regularly follows her home as well. And so, (oh happy day!) saving her from near rape, their romance blossoms.

I guess this marks their anniversary... Later on in the film he shyly admits to his true love that he used to peek in her bedroom window and watch her sleep without her knowing. Apparently this calls for a warm fuzzy feeling. Silly me, I would have called for the police.

This scene is taken from the romantic-comedy Untamed Heart starring Christian Slater and Marisa Tomei. I found this sequence more horrifying than watching a similar sequence in a horror film simply because of the context and the light-hearted treatment it received. Living in the ghetto, one of my biggest fears is having someone watching me in my own home, a place I like to think of as safe. As you've often read in the paper, incidents like these are not uncommon within the Queen's community, adding to the list of fears women must carry around with them. Yet in Hollywood cinema, this same scenario is linked to a sign of romance and affection. A justification of voyeurism.

Unfortunately, you don't have to look too hard to find examples of this attitude in many films. Even thinking back to the "family" film Robin Hood: Prince of Thieves, I remember being shocked to hear laughter coming from the audience. Please see WOMEN on page 35

Women

as Prince John yanks apart Maid Marian's legs (apparently an opportunity for humour) in his attempt to rape her. This type of display of dominance is prevalent in many horror-suspense films such as Unlawful Entry (the title speaks for itself) and Jennifer 8. These stalker films always have to do with power relations between men and women and the woman rarely comes out on top, so to speak. Rather she is made weak and helpless either physically (being blind in Jennifer 8) or psychologically, as in Unlawful Entry where she is ignorant of the danger she is in, even accused by her husband of being part of the problem. (Now there's an original twist...)

In a film such as Fatal Attraction, where the woman does have power and becomes a threat to the male, she is punished for her actions. As Susan Faludi discusses in Backlash, the whole film was changed, specifically the ending, to make Alex (Glenn Close) as much of a monster as possible. A "bad woman" that must be destroyed by the "good woman"; the married, angelic housewife (who doesn't even have a job because it was written out of the script). This one film stirred an extremely strong reaction in male audiences. As Tom Hanks says in Sleepless in Seattle: "Fatal Attraction made men everywhere paranoid!" Yet the fact that the countless films depicting female victimization barely get a second thought seems to show how ingrained and accepted violence towards women has become on screen.

I have to wonder why it is necessary for me to go to the movies knowing that there might be a scene that I do not want to watch, a scene that makes me frightened for my safety, or a scene that makes me angry because the social significance of what I am watching conveys an ominous message. Women are not weak, women are not powerless, yet our strength is undermined when we are portrayed this way in popular culture.

cal game between the two characters. Early, although crazy and desperate, admires the intellect of Brian and is eager to gain his respect. Brian, although frightened, is also intrigued and excited that he is getting great material for his book. Just when we are about to learn about Early's past however, the film degenerates into the typical "kill 'im—he's not dead yet—kill 'im again" sort of ending. Pitt is also not especially helped by the supporting cast, whose performances are good, but whose characters lack depth. Juliette Lewis, who was so whiny and helpless in Cape Fear, goes way over the top here, playing Adele up to the point where she comes off as borderline retarded.

Brad Pitt has described this film as "a quartet, where everyone has an equal role to play." In terms of screen time this is fairly accurate, but as far as the storyline goes, women are given very submissive roles. Before the violence begins, the characters pair up along stereotypical gender lines, with the men going to the bar and the women doing each others nails. Adele allows herself to be totally dominated by Early, which makes sense given that she is a victim of his abuse. It is unfortunate though, that she cannot be the one to finally defeat him. She gets some licks in, but then rolls over and falls apart while Brian goes off to save the day. Carrie, although supposedly a strong, creative person, is unable to assert her will either. She is constantly telling Brian that they should ditch this couple from hell, yet always defers to his poor judgement. This lack of innovation in portraying gender divisions is symptomatic of the problems of the film as a whole. Although stylish and suspenseful, Kalifornia is basically just another brainless, ultra-violent road flick.

PERSONALS

I.M.K.R.S.P.J.: It is difficult - nay, impossible - for me to express my gratitude for your constant support this year. Let me simply say "Thank you" and I love you, and wish you most wondrous holidays. I guess I'll miss most of them. Can we get together when I'm back? (Anyone for Kingston, Kate?) Cloia, J.

ARKADY: Love me, hold me and I might rub your belly! Derek.

TO THE FIGURE SKATING maestro, abuser of smiles, Heather. Merry Christmas to all of your kind and especially you. The Boy from St. Catharines.

TO SARAW: Roses are red; Violets are blue; "Will" what a poet! And you're just two! Just wanted to let you know how proud we are! Love 224!

To that sexy short haired DJ at Allie's, you can spin some tunes for me anytime! A secret admirer.

O.C.'93 - Transition dinner? Hugh - Sleeping bag lessons start Monday, Andrea and Mar - you missed the big dip! Drake - remember never lock cake in the bathroom (Jeff says thanks for the boxer advice)! Meet at the QP next! - OC '94.

THE BEAUTIFUL WOMAN at 95 Division St. Your big blue eyes and long blond hair and happy smile light up my day. Maybe one day I will have the courage to tell you this in person. Until then, I remain a friend. Merry Christmas.

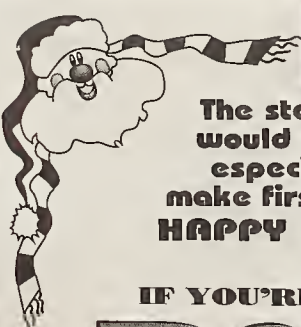

LASAGNA: This is a message from your two disco-lovin' housemates to wish you a very early, but very happy birthday! We hope all your "long cherished dreams come true" (Globe and Mail November 30) and we hope your fish will soon decide if it is male or female so we can give it a definitive name. Love CJV and AWD.

Sasha (not her real name) was languishing in adolescent ennui. Damn this Generation X lifestyle, she thought as she shopped at the drugstore for Bonne Belle foundation ($7.50). Suddenly, from the corner of her eye, she saw it. A teeny-bopper magazine. She gingerly pulled it from the rack and was drawn in by its tantalizing graphics. Little did she realize that soon she became a teeny-bopperzine addict.

Hello readers, and welcome to MISC. What you've just read is a fairly good imitation (at least I think so, anyway) of how a feature story in a teeny-bopper magazine begins: a seemingly personal anecdote about some composite character set in large type in order to suck you into the story. According to a recent CBC news show, teeny-bopperzines are a 30 million dollar market currently ruled by Sassy, Sassy, unlike its long-standing predecessors Seventeen and Young Miss (now called YM magazine), is flavoured with the sarcasm women reserve for describing their "exes" during girls' nights out. No other teeny-bopperzine has—surprise the male phallic reference—the copious use of the word femminism on a regular basis or to tell Cosmopolitan to "bite us". Sassy, with its hip swagger, not only attracted a large female readership, but a large number of male readers as well (this 'umble editor included).

Imagine my surprise when two magazines called tell and quake (yes, both lacked capitals) it's all part of the fin-de-siecle style zeitgeist) with a distinctively Sassy look appeared on newstands last month. Hardcore Sassy reader that I am, I bought both, along with a new Canadian entry called Ingenue I ran home, wrapped my hair in a pink towel, wore my pink terry robe and fuzzy slippers and started reading with a Moxxy frivolous tape playing in the background.

Yes guys read them too. All right, I was kidding about the Moxxy frivolous. But I do like to peruse the stuff. After all, the best way to understand an alien culture is to examine its literature. Your 'umble editor remembers perusing these magazines in high school in an attempt to decipher the female mind I did this, secretly until I saw Heartbreak Ridge, where hardened soldier Clint Eastwood read women's magazines, trying to find advice on how to mend things with his estranged wife. Hey man — if Clint took up dollie cutting, then would all be buying scissors the next day.

The 5 sections a teeny-bopperzine must have

1. Advice columns. One for "health" (meaning sex), one for "boys" (also meaning sex) and beauty tips (leads to sex).
2. Fashion spread. Generates ad revenue without actually looking like an ad. Helps you fake integrity.
3. Horoscopes. All predictions say the same thing: watch your bank account and romance is in your future.
4. Beauty tips. How to put on makeup in a way that looks like you're not wearing any.
5. Chunky, funky easy-to-read layout. Half the page should be taken up by titles, C&C video-esque typesetting, sidebars (like this one) and graphics. After all, how much can you write on the same topics twelve times a month?

Teen Scene

How to read them. Teeny-bopperzines know that their audience has been weaned on television and must therefore emulate it (cue sound of Marshall McLuhan screaming). You're not meant to read the magazine linearly (from start to finish), but bounce around from article to article as if you were channel-surfing. You can even do that within articles since they're written as idea nuggets that can be read in any order. Brevity rules — most can be read in a span of time equivalent to either the time women think nail polish should dry, what most men's idea of how long sex should take (including foreplay) or the time it takes a supercomputer to add two single digit numbers together.

Every judge a magazine by its cover. Especially if the article descriptions on the cover have something tantalizing like How to make a boy cry, Why girls hate sex or Five ways to look older. All these teasers appeared on the cover of tell magazine, and all referred to filler articles that occupied some obscure corner of some obscure page of the magazine. One aside — the best tip on how to look older reads: "Don't even think about wearing ripped jeans. Talk about dead giveaways, plus they're so 1989."

Guy talk. All good teeny-bopperzines feature some section where either a male guest columnist writes on some topic from a real live male's point of view or a roundtable interview with a gaggle of guys. Here are some choice gems from a panel of men interviewed by tell:

"I used to worry about my looks because I didn't think I was good-looking enough. But now I just try not to smell."

"I've cheated on three girls in my life... Actually she cheated on me more than I cheated on her."

"There are the categories: There are girls you want to have sex with but you can't. There are girls you can have sex with. Then there are girlfriend girls. These are one in a hundred."

And of course, after reading stuff like this, they expect you to jump to the article entitled How to Land a Boyfriend. If you really want to understand straight male sexuality go to the video store and rent Three Stooges videos. That's 90% of the encyclopedia right there. Nyik, nyik nyik.

Fashion. All true teeny-bopperzines dedicate roughly one third of their pages to the dreaded fashion spread. While most of us realize that the makers of the clothing shown are paying a promotional fee, we're pretty content to suspend our disbelief and pretend that the writers found while shopping and liked so much that they had to show them to us in the fashion spread. Of the three fledgling magazines reviewed, my fave spread appeared in quake and was entitled What to wear (and not to wear) on that first date. The photos were of the standard contrived "as a matter of fact, I always naturally strike this pose" quality, but the "don'ts" were priceless! I'll bet you didn't know that a beeper is something you shouldn't wear on a first date. One imagines that nothing kills gentle flirtation more than excusing yourself in order to handle a crucial drug deal. Did they have to tell us that Bon Jovi concert T-shirts, tank tops, Birkenstocks, leggings, sweatshirts and baseball caps are not acceptable items to wear to a semi-formal? On second thought, considering that this is Queen's, perhaps it's a good thing they told us about the baseball caps...

Specifics Ingenue is the thickest of the three and looks a helluva lot like Flare (probably because they're both published by the same folks). As a result, it both looks and reads like Elle since even Flare's creative staff admit to trying to be as Elle-like as possible. It's a bit staid in comparison to tell and quake, it makes up for it with — eek — actual content. There is a human interest story on the lives of Barrie's Stevens triplets, an interview with a 27-year old woman who's responsible for the graphic design of President's Choice products, and next month, they promise an article on interracial dating. Their makeup tips accommodate both light and dark skin types and nowhere do they use the phrase "majorly psyched" (alas, tell does). On the con side, it has a look that screams "Canadian" (read "second place") and features an interview with Erika Elm quake is the thinnest of the three and skimps on everything but layout. Stories are incredibly low on content and many features are low effort filler. One example: they sent disposable cameras to people all over the U.S. and asked them to take photos of what they were doing on Memorial Day and include a short essay. No muss, no fuss, Betty Crocker instant journalism at its finest. Trees died for this?

tell is the most Sassy-esque of the three. It has the requisite interview with a cool band (Smashing Pumpkins), a close-but-not-quite facsimile of Sassy's trademark sassiness and they even handed two pages of the magazine to the editors of Chickfactor, a Riot Grrrl fanzine. Features included a visit to the Holocaust Museum and an interview with Will Smith, a.k.a. the Fresh Prince. My biggest problem with tell is the unnerveingly high content of NBC ads (three full pages) and the six-page section on hot new shows on NBC (Saved by the Bell, Blossom, etc.). This ad/article section mangles the language with faux-cool verbiage like "studly-but-sincere" and "radically together". However I did find Mayim Bialik's (she plays Blossom) top 10 reads amusing. Yeah, I believe she's a hardcore Ayn Rand fanatic. As Sassy would say: tell is owned by NBC, peut-etre?

Final! Teeny-bopperzines have that certain edge to them that Cosmo lacks, simply because of what could be called fresh-faced innocence (unlike Cosmo, they don't tell you how to fellate someone). Their articles are more idealistic and less jaded. And with the increasing influence of underground fanzines, many of whose editors and writers now

Why we should even, like, worry about teeny-bopperzines

Between the onset of puberty and the close of adolescence, your parents go through a period where they know absolutely nothing. Nada. Zip. Honkies de Konkis, as it were. Fashion tips from Mom or Dad? Get real. Cool music? Yeah, your parents will tell you what good music is. Shure. Sex? From Mater and Pater? Pull the other one, chump.

So who are you going to get your advice from if you're a mixed up teen who's feeling alienated (remember the first time you read The Catcher in the Rye or The Bell Jar)? C'mon, buddy, hazard a guess. They read teeny-bopperzines. Seeing as the current crop of readers will someday be our juniors partners in a plush law firm in our not-too-distant future, we ought to worry about what kids are being programmed with these days.

write for teeny-bopperzines, they have a punk/grunge/whatever edge that the medium needs badly. What they need (even Sassy) is to incorporate new, hip feminist writing that's not either bogged down in Where's the yearbook?

BY BRAD ELDER

Phone the Tricolour Yearbook office these days, and a voice on the answering machine will tell you that "the 1992-93 yearbooks are not out at the moment. They are hopefully going to be ready for January, however..."

According to Alma Mater Society Media Services Director Eric Jabal (under whose jurisdiction the yearbook falls), the original deadline for the '92-'93 yearbook was last May.

But due to mistakes, mishandling and miscommunication, it is still not available.

So who's at fault? Jabal and 1993-94 yearbook Editor-in-chief Karen Kilcullen point their fingers at Robert Yee, who was the editor-in-chief of the '92-'93 yearbook.

"Basically I've had a problem dumped in my lap," said Kilcullen, who is simultaneously trying to see the '92-'93 yearbook and the '93-'94 yearbook through to completion.

She told The Journal that although Yee reported that he had completed the yearbook last May, she and Jabal were surprised in September to learn that 62 pages of the book were missing.

"Nobody was aware that he had not finished the book," Kilcullen said. "Basically he gave the publishers and the AMS the runaround."

Kilcullen expressed her desire to inform the Queen's community that although she is now handling the '92-'93 yearbook fiasco, "this is not my book." She explained that she is responsible for the book because she now holds the position of editor-in-chief.

Kilcullen said she does expect to meet the May deadline for the '93-'94 yearbook, despite the problems revolving around the '92-'93 edition, which she must deal with "on a day-to-day basis."

As for the '92-'93 yearbook, Jabal said that although the final flats were finally completed in November and sent to Herff-Jones Printing for publishing, production has been halted once again.

Profs cancel classes for Rae Days

Administration fears effect on quality of education

BY ADAM EMERY
AND THE QUEEN'S
JOURNAL NEWS STAFF

Bob Rae may have cancelled some of your classes.

Ontario's Social Contract legislation, passed in the summer, calls for five and a half unpaid days of leave per year for faculty and support staff, which represents a three per cent reduction in annual salary.

And although most professors appear committed to not taking their leave on days they are to teach, a few have decided to cancel some of their lectures.

The English department has decided to support faculty who want to take two of their social contract five and a half days of leave on teaching days.

And Professors Edward Lobb and Marta Straznicky have both taken the department's advice and recently taken class days off as "Rae Days."

Arts and Science Dean David Turpin said the decision whether to take the leave has been left to the individuals involved. "A large number of faculty are not taking the days at all," Turpin said.

On a syllabus handed out to a fourth-year politics class by Prof. Neil MacFarlane, a lecture in March is marked "Rae Day." MacFarlane couldn't be reached for comment before press time.

However, politics department Head David Haglund said he was not aware of MacFarlane's decision, and said his department has not made a statement to profs about taking Rae Days on teaching days. It is being left up to the individual professors, he said.

Dean Turpin said it is important to commend those individuals who are not taking these days off and "have decided not to harm the quality of education."

"At the same time, we've got to be careful. If there's no effect [on the quality of education], then the decision next year could be to take 10 days or 20 days off," he said.

Vice-Principal (Resources) Rod Fraser said there would be an impact on the quality of education if all profs took their leave on teaching days. But he said the majority of the faculty is not taking the days off.

"It would be more accurate to call this a three per cent roll-back in salary — fullstop," he said.

George Logan, head of the English department, said the problem with the extra

Alfie's profits with pints

BY LORI THORLAKSON

Besides the balloons and the noisemakers, New Year's Eve at Alfie's was not much different from any other night this week. The campus pub has been packed with students since opening this year.

The combination of students with free time on their hands and a new pint bar has proved unbeatable for bar sales.

Alfie's underwent a makeover this year in an attempt to pull in more patrons, and now boasts a new bar, midway through construction, that sells Rickard's Red and Labatt's 50 Ale by the pint.

The formula seems to be working because Alfie's has been filled to capacity just about every day of Welcome Back Week, according to Assistant Manager Katy Waugh.

"Of course, the snow helps," she added.

Most agree that offering beer by the pint for a competitive $3.55 is a move that is sure to boost sales. The Quiet Pub offers a pint of Rickard's for $4.50. "So far it's been a big hit," said

Waugh. She estimates that daily pint sales have been between 300 and 500 this week.

"We've got a lot of compliments on the pints," she said, adding that having the satellite bar speeds up service at Alfie's.

Although the price is good, some students like Vanessa Timmer just like the idea of being able to buy a darker beer by the pint. "I like my ale dark," she said, looking over the crowd from her vantage point on the riser.

Dave Irwin was serving up pitchers at Alfie's on Wednesday night and speculated on the appeal of a darker ale. "I don't know if it's a macho thing or not. Guys like a darker ale — like Rickard's," he said.

A good dark ale? A macho beer? Craig Walter had his own ideas. "I think women drink Rickard's because it's lighter but tastes like a dark beer... I don't want to appear sexist or anything, though."

The trend toward darker beers has not escaped the notice of Quiet Pub Assistant Manager Dave Cameron, who said the pub will soon offer Guinness on tap permanently.

Chris Chapman, Hayley Stephens and Sanjay Panchal were taking advantage of Alfie's new pint sales. "I would have thought Alfie's would have thought of this sooner," said Chapman. "It will do a lot for business."

Chapman and his friends don't usually come to Alfie's. "We usually go to The Shot," Stephens explained. "Alfie's is a younger crowd."

However, with pints at $3.55, Stephens said that she and her friends would probably come back. This is high praise coming from Stephens, who works summers as a Kronenbourg sales rep. "The prices are very competitive," Panchal added.

Craig Walter's verdict was in. "The beer is now as good as Stouley's, so we have a reason to come to Alfie's," he said.

For his friend Bill Snider, however, this still wasn't enough to make him an Alfie's regular. "But," he said, "if they had Carlsberg on tap I'd be here every night."

Cold snap brings $10,000 repair bill

BY TUDOR CALDWELL

The extremely cold temperatures in Kingston over the break created extra work for Queen's security and maintenance and custodial staff, and left the university with a huge clean-up bill.

Brian Scovill, maintenance manager for Campus Engineering Services, estimates that the holiday cold snap caused between seven and ten thousand dollars of damage to buildings.

Queen's maintenance workers logged in 212 overtime hours to keep up with emergency calls. Maintenance responded to 32 calls to problem areas around campus — almost triple the usual number.

Scovill said damage occurred in several buildings on campus when water lines froze, causing water leaks and "quite a few problems."

LaSalle and Jeffery Halls were both affected by frozen pipes and leaks, but the worst damage occurred in Stirling and Dupuis Halls. In Stirling a leak ruined floor tiles and walls, while at Dupuis two maintenance workers had to spend the better part of New Year's Day repairing several frozen water lines.

Frozen radiators in Gordon House, Brockington House and Victoria Hall also sprung leaks, damaging several rooms. According to Scovill, the Gordon and Brockington residences traditionally have problems with freezing, due to their exposure to strong winds off of the lake.

"Only having one water break there this year is quite good," Scovill said.

He explained that most of the buildings on campus are older and thus are simply not built to modern standards.

In addition to high winds, Scovill attributed the problems to the unusually prolonged period of extreme cold. He pointed out that buildings like people, can experience a "wind-chill factor" which makes conditions far worse than they would otherwise be.

While these difficulties may seem inevitable given the climate, a new computerized system is gradually being implemented at Queen's which could help to eliminate such problems.

This system allows building temperatures to be monitored by computers from locations off-campus. Security, upon discovering that a building is too cold, can notify one of four people who have access to the computer system from their homes. The temperature can then be adjusted immediately so that costly and time-consuming problems, such as frozen pipes, are avoided.

There are currently 26 buildings on campus which are climate-controlled by this computerized system. These include the John Deutsch University Centre and the Phys Ed centre, both of which required temperature adjustments over the break. The necessary adjustments were made and both buildings escaped damage from freezing.

Scovill thanked Security for "doing a good job at picking up problems" as they arose, making it possible to correct low temperatures in many buildings before exposed areas froze up.

White appears as a presentation of the Alma Mater Society and Arts and Science Undergraduate Society speakers committees.

BLACK PANTHER TO SPEAK AT DUNNING

Imam Jamil Al-Amin, formerly H. Rap Brown, Minister of Justice of the Black Panthers, will be speaking this Saturday, Jan. 15, at 7 p.m. in Dunning Auditorium on social justice in the Americas.

HOUSE ABOUT THAT COMMITTEE...

The AMS Housing Issues Committee is holding a Housing Exposition on Monday Jan. 17, and Tuesday Jan. 18 from 10 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. in the Lower Ceilidh of the John Deutsch University Centre. Representatives from 10 organizations will be on hand to answer questions on student housing.

GREAT DEBATES

Canada's longest running and most renowned business competition will take place this weekend at Queen's. The 16th Annual Inter-Collegiate Business Competition will run Jan. 13 to 16, with the final debate taking center stage in Dunning Hall Auditorium Saturday at 5:30 p.m.

Universities from across Canada will be competing in the event. In recent years, the big winners have included the University of Calgary and Queen's.

Quiet Pub back to usual hours

BY SHARON WILSON

The Quiet Pub has returned to its regular hours and Manager Nancy Murphy is looking forward to "putting last semester behind and starting with a clean slate."

At the end of first term the Quiet Pub was forced to close early — at 11 p.m. rather than after last call at 12:30 a.m. — due to noise complaints made by the students who live above the pub in a graduate residence.

In an effort to resolve the situation, Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations) Tom Williams requested that the Alma Mater Society, which runs the pub, put forth proposals which would address the control of sound as well as outline an education campaign regarding how the managers intend to change the image of the pub.

Over the holidays QP management put forth proposals, and in a meeting with VP Williams on Monday morning it was decided that the QP would be able to return to its regular hours of operation.

According to Murphy, the QP will be testing out a new stereo limiter which will automatically modify the output coming from the stereo and reduce the noise level. Assistant manager Dave Beach said the pub would borrow the limiter from the games room "on a trial basis, probably starting next week."

As well, Murphy said the biggest change will be moving the QP's live entertainment from Saturday night to Fridays between 4 and 8 p.m.

Murphy feels the situation was finally able to be resolved due to "a four week cooling-off period" for all parties involved in the dispute.

VP Williams pointed out that the return to regular hours will occur only on a trial basis, and said that if the QP "continues to have problems, almost immediately, it will return to the hours previous to Christmas."

When asked if the QP will be reducing its hours for the April exam period, Murphy said they "will have to cross the hurdle of exam time when we come to it."

She is optimistic about the return to regular hours and said the QP hopes to have the stereo limiter implemented by the end of this week.

Beach expected that a new limiter could cost about $3,000, and said the QP "is trying not to get it." He believes QP staff could be trusted to keep volume levels down.

"I don't think we need one. It's more the grad students want one, and VP Williams," Beach said.

Murphy is confident students will not be disappointed with the new changes to the QP, indicating the pub has been doing well this past week.

For now, other solutions to prevent the noise problem, like soundproofing the pub or moving it to a new location, are on hold.

Murphy said a sound-testing company has examined the building and found nothing wrong with its construction.

She suggested the problem is that the residences are too quiet, and a possible solution may be a background noise-making machine. The machine would reduce the noise from the QP that graduate students hear in their rooms.

According to Beach, such a machine is currently used above the International Centre, just around the corner from the QP in the John Deutsch University Centre.

However, Murphy stressed that such a machine would not be put into use this year.

Front Street Freeze-Out

Voyageur strands students in Toronto, temporarily

BY KRISTEN KUNNAS

Queen's students eager to return to campus experienced a chilly start to their term, as a Sunday Tricolour Express bus kept them waiting outside for hours.

Some of the students expecting to return to Kingston on the 8 p.m. Tricolour Express from Toronto had to wait as long as three hours in freezing weather before a bus arrived.

Tricolour Express Manager Erin O'Gorman told The Journal she had made all the necessary arrangements to ensure the smooth operation of the Tricolour buses, but said, "essentially, [Voyageur] forgot about us."

"This is absolutely unacceptable," O'Gorman said.

She explained that due to a reorganization in Voyageur dispatching offices, the Tricolour had to deal with a dispatching office in Ottawa. She said this may have been the cause of the delay.

It was not until a student in Toronto called Voyageur that the first bus arrived at the terminal — an hour and a half late.

Kathryn Fullet (Arts '96) was one of the many students waiting for a Tricolour bus.

"It was crazy," she said. "After the first bus came there was a mad rush. I missed the first bus, but little did I know that I would have to wait another hour and a half for the second bus."

Since the buses actually stop more than a block away from Union Station, it was not possible to wait inside the station, Fuller said. Instead, students waited inside the lobby of a building further down Front Street.

Unfortunately, the managers at that location called the police, so students also had to call the police to explain the situation.

Furthermore, when the second bus finally did arrive in Kingston, Fuller said, their irate bus driver announced that he had nothing to do with the situation and would never volunteer to drive Queen's students again.

O'Gorman stated that compensation will be available, and that she has been trying to compile a list of the students who had to wait in Toronto for Tricolour buses.

Motivated, O'Gorman said she has already spoken to the Operating Director of Voyageur to arrange a meeting to discuss compensation for Queen's students and the Tricolour Express, adding that Voyageur "has been quite responsive."

"There is no excuse at all," she reflected. "But unfortunately our hands are tied with respect to [bus] companies."

Fullet said that she was pleased with the action taken by O'Gorman. "That's pretty commendable. I'm glad to know that Tricolour wasn't at fault," Fuller said.

days of unpaid leave is that the government did not specify when they were to be taken.

The English department's decision is based on the theory that 40 per cent of each professor's time is spent on teaching, 40 per cent on research, and 20 per cent on administrative affairs. Although two class days are less than 40 per cent of the total, the effect is enough to be felt, Logan said.

He said that at an Oct. 5 departmental meeting, "many felt strongly that people are entitled to their five and a half days off. It's part of the contract now."

However, Logan did say that "this action is more of a symbolic statement — it's a no-win situation."

The decision to officially endorse taking two class days off was not an easy one for the department. "There was a good deal of disagreement as to whether something useful could be done," Logan said.

While taking an official position is a positive step, he also pointed out the inherent flaws in actually taking these five and a half days of unpaid leave. "How do you take research days off? Salary increases are largely based on research. Therefore, why injure myself by slowing my research?" he questioned.

Holiday break means holiday break-ins

BY JAMIE LLOYD-SMITH

For students of 22 households in the Queen's student area, a rude surprise awaited them upon their return from the holidays.

Kingston Police were notified of 22 break-and-enters between Dec. 20 and Jan. 12 in the region south of Princess, between Barrie and Frontenac Streets. In the same period, there were only 16 break-and-enters reported in the entire remainder of Kingston.

Detective-Sergeant Bill Doxtator said this number is not much changed from last year, and that break-in rates are always quite high around this period.

"It's an area that seems to get targeted, since the bulk of the residents leave for the holidays," Doxtator said. He added that the most commonly stolen items included CD players, stereo equipment and bicycles.

Doxtator emphasized prevention, and urged Queen's students to contact the police's teaching. But, people are reluctant for a variety of reasons. For one thing, the academic year is too short," he said.

Logan said that he was aware of the need to maintain a high quality of education, and recog-

Community Services department, or else to drop by the station at the intersection of Queen and Ontario. Pamphlets are available on personal safety, property safety, and the prevention of break-and-enters.

"It's very unfortunate," he said. Many of these situations could be avoided, he said, "if people would take expensive stuff away, or have friends check on it."

For those of us without friends who stay in town over the holidays, the Alma Mater Society ran a Holiday Home-check Program. The Communication Commission's Lisa Roth-schild said patrols checked 51 houses in the student area once every two days, stomped on snow and collected mail to make houses look inhabited. The program cost $2 per check.

Housing Issues Committee Chair Henry White said the AMS has received a very positive response to the program. However, he said there was one incident of an AMS-checked house which was broken into.

nized that students have also taken on the added burden of a $100 levy.

"I don't have any intention of cancelling any classes," Logan said. "I always feel time is too short anyway."

Frosh week curtailed a half day

SOARB report recommends extending Residence Days

BY TANIS ROBINSON

Frosh will not meet their Gaels until a day later than usual in next year's Orientation Week.

The Nov. 25 report made by the Senate Orientation Activities Review Board (SOARB) to the University Senate recommends that the first two days of frosh week be designated as Residence Days.

This academic year, frosh met their Gael Group leaders on the Tuesday morning of Orientation Week, only for a couple hours and on the condition that it was for purely academic reasons, according to next year's Head Gael Jen Clarke. She added that no cheering, chanting, or other such manifestations of Queen's spirit were allowed until Wednesday.

Clarke said, "it is the Senate's point of view that [Residence Days] should let students enjoy residence," instead of being subjected immediately to what she said the Senate calls the "too-loud, overbearing and cult-like" atmosphere of the rest of frosh week.

The designation of two Residence Days is not a new idea, but rather the implementation of a recommendation approved by Senate in December of 1990. It has merely been put off for the past two years, Clarke said. Extensions had been granted in response to appeals from the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society (ASUS) and the Faculty of Arts and Science.

"Of course I'd love to plan activities on Tuesday... I think you could retreat there," Bennett said. Another recommendation made by SOARB in its November report was disbanding the Alma Mater Society Orientation Committee (AMSOC). The report states that AMSOC's "responsibility for welcoming and alternate events [has] been transferred to the Main Campus Residence Council and the Jean Royce Hall Council with the coordinational task between Faculty Society Orientation Committees and leader training

"It's unrealistic for anyone to hold the opinion that we can get the full frosh week of four years ago back."

—Jen Clarke, next year's Head Gael.

Christina Raheja, another Gael, agreed. "When we first met the frosh, we couldn't even do anything. Last year, when we met our Gaels, we got the spirit of Queen's immediately."

However, Clarke expressed the view that Orientation Week has changed for the better over the years, and said she understood the changes made. "It's unrealistic for anyone to hold the opinion that we can get the full frosh week of four years ago back."

Jim Bennett, professor of Electrical Engineering and the chair of SOARB, said the recommendation of two Residence Days was approved because when it was done in 1990 it proved to be a great success.

"If in fact we're sincere about students being able to drop out of orientation — it was considered by Senate — [it is important] that students be familiar with their new surroundings so they could retreat there," Bennett said. Another recommendation made by SOARB in its November report was disbanding the Alma Mater Society Orientation Committee (AMSOC). The report states that AMSOC's "responsibility for welcoming and alternate events [has] been transferred to the Main Campus Residence Council and the Jean Royce Hall Council with the coordinational task between Faculty Society Orientation Committees and leader training

According to the SOARB report, the new Orientation Roundtable will consist of "representatives from all of the Faculty Society Orientation Committees, the Transfer Student Orientation Committee, MCRC and the Jean Royce Hall Council, as well as the Roundtable Facilitator and Roundtable Speaker."

Lulka made it clear that the Roundtable had nothing to do with SOARB.

Jabal explained that when Herff-Jones returned the "blues" — the proofs — in the middle of December for a final check, he and Kilcullen discovered disturbing discrepancies in the book's content.

Jabal had not seen the flats before they were sent to the publishers, he said, because Yee had sent them directly to the company.

Jabal said that Yee had decided to add a small box running along the bottom of the graduate section which included quotations from AMS officials, campus and community officials, and a porn star.

But "we aren't questioning the quotations themselves," Jabal said, rather "the appropriateness of the quotations within the graduate section." He added that the graduate section has historically been purely "a record-keeping section" and not a forum for editorializing.

Jabal explained that in consultation with various campus groups, administration and both Kilcullen and Yee, he must first decide what to do with the quotations before the "blues" can be sent back for printing.

Now, Jabal said, the yearbook team must decide whether to remove the quotations altogether, or add the quotations elsewhere in the '92-'93 yearbook. This second option, he added, would occur at an "extreme cost" to the AMS.

The decision to modify the "blues" will be made by Jan. 21, Jabal said, at which time final proofs will be shipped to Herff-Jones Printing. He said he was optimistic that the '92-'93 yearbook would be available before Reading Week in February.

Jabal expressed displeasure with Yee's decision to include the quotations in the graduate section. "I was extremely upset with some of the material and decisions he made," he said.

For his part, Yee said the '92-'93 yearbook was delayed by obstacles which were beyond his control.

"We finished the book in April and Sherri Fraser [last year's Media Services Director] approved it," he said, blaming the delay on software, copyright and technical problems.

But Jabal dismissed these glitches as "minor" and cited a "sheer absence of material" as the reason for the delay in finishing the book.

He said that he didn't know what Yee had shown Fraser in April of last year, but expressed doubt that it was the completed yearbook.

Yee added that communication problems with Kilcullen and Jabal, as well as a poor transition between the editors-in-chief, also hampered the project.

Kilcullen agreed that transition was inadequate, but placed the blame on Yee, saying that Yee would only offer help "grudgingly."

Yee also claimed that the photography section, of which Kilcullen was the editor, was not completed satisfactorily, and contributed to the delay.

Kilcullen contested this complaint, saying, "as photo editor my job was 100 per cent complete."

Another problem, Yee said, was that Kilcullen was unaware of her duty to order the delivery of the '92-'93 yearbooks. "If Karen had called early enough then the book would have been delivered" as early as November, he said.

Jabal rejected this suggestion, asking how the books could have been delivered when Yee had only just sent the first flats to the publishers.

Kilcullen responded by saying that if it was her duty to phone Herff-Jones to have the yearbooks delivered, Yee had failed to inform her of this. "It was a complete omission on his part," she said.

Yee, who was fired from his post as business manager of the '93-'94 yearbook during the summer, told The Journal that he did not feel obliged to aid Kilcullen. "Once I was fired I didn't think that I had any responsibility to do anything," he said.

Principal given Order of Canada

BY DENNIS PAO

In an announcement last week, Principal David C. Smith was appointed to the Order of Canada by the Governor-General.

Smith is one of 52 new members to be presented with the insignia of the Order, one of Canada's most prestigious awards, at a ceremony in Ottawa. In addition to receiving a badge, he will have the opportunity to use, among his other designations, the letters C.M. after his name.

The Order of Canada was established in 1967 to honour achievement and service in various areas of human endeavour. Prominent Canadians who have been appointed to the Order in the past include such luminaries as astronaut Roberta Bondar and former Olympic figure skater Brian Orser.

Principal Smith was impressed by the diversity of past recipients. "One of the things I find interesting is that over the list, people are recognized for an extraordinary diverse activities — an enormous range of ways," he said in an interview.

Smith's citation outlines his achievements: "A renowned economics scholar and teacher, he is the Principal and Vice-Chancellor of Queen's University, where he founded the Institute for the Study of Economic Policy. He has gained widespread recognition as chair of the Council of Ontario Universities and, outside academia, as director of economics research for the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada."

Smith said he was pleased with the award.

"I feel honoured but it's always seemed to me that these awards are imperfect in the selection process," he said. "Most accomplishments are really not individual; they come from a lot of people."

Principal Smith will attend the investiture ceremonies at Rideau Hall in Ottawa on Feb. 16.

High resolutions for '94

BY THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL NEWS STAFF

Everybody makes them, but almost nobody keeps them.

The Journal did an informal survey of prominent campus personalities and their New Year's resolutions, just to fill space.

Your elected officials in student government will have a busy year in 1994 if they manage to keep their resolutions.

In an interview at Alfie's on Wednesday evening, Alma Mater Society President Katherine Philips said her resolutions included to "stay sane until April 30," the date when she steps down, as well as to "find a formal date."

Philips also said she'd resolved to find a job after graduating. AMS Academic Affairs Commissioner Taz Pirmohamed said she had resolved "to learn how to surf."

Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell said her New Year's resolution was to "not put up with people's shit anymore."

Queen's University radio personality Jerome Poon Ting, CFRC's Programming Assistant, said he had resolved to "grow the biggest Afro and punctuate my sentences with 'Dy-no-mite'."

And Rector David Baar has resolved to "do something about that pesky PhD thesis."

This paper's Assistant News Editor Brad Elderberry vowed to attend more AMS Assemblies naked, except for socks and Vans.

Queen's administration made some promises Dec. 31 as well.

Vice-Principal (Operations and University Relations) Tom Williams at first said he wasn't sure if he had any New Year's resolutions fit for publication, when contacted by phone Wednesday afternoon. He did say though, in light of the recent turn of events involving noise problems at the Quiet Pub, that he hopes to "maintain more harmonious relations with pub managers."

TERRY FOX HUMANITARIAN AWARD PROGRAM

Under the Terry Fox Humanitarian Award Program, successful candidates can receive $4,000 annually, to a maximum of four years or until a first degree is obtained. Scholarships are available each year to graduating secondary level students and those currently enrolled in a first degree or diploma program at a Canadian university or college.

Selection criteria for recipients will be based on demonstration of the highest ideals and qualities of citizenship and humanitarian service while in pursuit of excellence in their academic, amateur sport, fitness, health, community service and related endeavours. This pursuit of excellence, coupled with a contribution to the community is especially important in light of any obstacles candidates may have, such as a physical disability, personal problems, social setting, or any factors which call for courage, unselfishness and fortitude. Furthermore, the Terry Fox Scholarship is not primarily an athletic award, and while one's academic record is important, it is not of paramount importance.

A Selection Committee at Queen's will nominate deserving candidates for consideration by the corporation's Board of Directors. The Board is solely responsible for the final determination of successful candidates.

Deadline for submission of applicants, complete with supporting documents, is Friday, 28 January, 1994.

Further information and application forms are available at the Student Awards Office, 131 Union Street, 2nd Floor.

It's a shame about Rae...

Your class was cancelled today. Prof's illness? Inclement weather? Nope - it's a Rae Day. The Ontario government's Social Contract legislation calls for a three per cent wage cut in the form of five and a half days of unpaid leave for university faculty and staff.

Admittedly, the vast majority of profs at Queen's aren't even considering cancelling lectures to take their Rae Days, but the English department has officially decided to support faculty who want to take two of their five and a half unpaid leave days when they are supposed to be teaching.

Other departments have left the decision to take the leave squarely on the shoulders of the individual profs. And some are taking a stand. On Professor Neil MacFarlane's syllabus for his Middle Eastern politics course, March 14 is actually marked as a "Rae Day."

When a prof decides to take a Rae Day and cancel classes, it puts us, the students, in an awkward position. Looking at things from the point of view of students as consumers, we are getting tipped off.

With the new $100 compulsory student assistance levy, we're paying even more for our education. Yet, we are receiving less in return. Many profs complain that the academic year is too short as it is to adequately cover course material.

It isn't hard to see how the quality of education will plummet if this practice of vacation-as-protest becomes more widespread.

But the point, for profs taking the time off, is to make a point.

If they just took research days off, no one would notice, or care. And they'd just get behind in their research.

So, what good will taking teaching days off do?

Prof's taking the time off say it will send a message to the government. It will make it harder for Queen's Park to continue to cut back salaries while claiming such cuts won't harm the quality of education.

In some ways, this is the best strategy the profs have at their disposal. Getting the students upser, and encouraging them or their parents to write their MPP about it is probably going to get their displeasure registered at Queen's Park.

But, isn't this kind of juvenile?

The long and drawn-out social contract negotiations this summer, perhaps the number one media-bore of 1993, are over. The decision to cut back has already been made, and carping publicly by cancelling classes makes profs look bad.

Teaching is a profession that is supposed to be beyond this sort of thing. Professors have a special responsibility to their students, and using us as a pawn in wage negotiations isn't fair.

A politically incorrect university

It seems inconceivable that a university could survive today without government funding. It also seems inconceivable that a university could survive today with a curriculum centring solely around the scholarly works of what are commonly referred to as dead white males. But there is a college in Michigan that does just that. And it doesn't just survive, it flourishes.

Why would we be concerned about what a college in Michigan does? In the age of underfunding, we should care.

Hillsdale College, located in Hillsdale, Michigan, is an entirely independent university. It accepts absolutely no funding from the government whatsoever. It will not accept any students on government-sponsored grants or loans or any research funding from the government. Not will it offer any military training programs.

Of the 1,200 students at the college, 80 per cent need financial assistance and one hundred per cent of those students receive it from the college itself.

It sounds like a post-secondary utopia. Hillsdale is devoted to a liberal arts education, requiring all students to take math, science, and political economy among other things. Funding is provided by alumni, foundations and companies. One of the most important sources of funding, however, comes from people who support the independent stand the college has taken.

Hillsdale College was founded in 1844 by both men and women dedicated to equal opportunity. The college's charter, written in 1844 says the college will furnish all persons who wish, irrespective of nation, color or sex, a literary and scientific education. Degrees were granted to black students before the Civil War.

So why would this university refuse government funding?

In an article published in June of 1993 in the White Standard magazine, The Companion, Neil Reynolds said that in the future of Hillsdale College, as small and insignificant as it appears to be, we may find the fate of higher education in North America.

Reynolds is concerned with the university as an independent institution. Hillsdale College, which has been running their own affirmative action program since the mid-1800s, is concerned with government intervention whether intended to help or harm. And only by refusing to accept government funding can Hillsdale remain free from government control.

Cutting itself from government funding was a response to Justice Department demands for the gender and racial composition of Hillsdale's faculty as the first step in a government affirmative action program.

Queen's faculty is subject to the Ontario government's Employment Equity program. The question here concerns not the virtues or vices of the Equity program, but the freedom of universities to develop their own paths of action.

Of course, it is fully inconceivable that Queen's would ever try to free itself from government funding, at least in the foreseeable future.

For Queen's to do so would mean sacrificing itself completely to the demands of corporate sponsors. Although many believe that this would be a step in the right direction, (for example in the area of business), many also argue that a liberal arts education, to maintain its integrity, must remain free from corporate influence.

Hillsdale College has not dissociated itself from corporate financial sponsorship, but they say they are not pressured by corporate interests. But, one wonders, if they did decide to introduce new curriculum that delved into ethnic issues or revisionist history, would they lose some of their corporate sponsorship? They would definitely lose some of their political support.

Is a university necessarily better because it is free from government control? Or does the government play an intrinsic role in protecting the individual, that protection being expressed through not just the courts, but programs like affirmative action?

Employment Equity programs are designed to combat systemic racism and sexism in institutions, and in so far as they do this, universities with such programs should be better places.

However, a university such as Hillsdale College which has had its own affirmative action program since its founding must garner much more respect than those that only have such programs due to legislation.

It is something to think about. As we demand for more government funding, we should remember that this funding will not come unconditionally. We should all think about what strings are attached, and how those strings affect our education.

MORE QUESTIONS THAN ANSWERS

While following The Journal's coverage of the sexual assault case which went to Senate for review of the term of campus suspension imposed on the perpetrator, a curious question struck me. How is it, a year after the attack, that the attacker's name has not yet come out in the press?

In five other recent campus-related cases involving sexual assault or sexual harassment in the last four years (the alleged perpetrators were Geoff Green, Robert Van Oostrom, William Ma, Prof. Cedric Schubert, and Alonso Bartley), names of those alleged appeared in print at various points during the respective cases.

While every case is different, and while guidelines of responsible journalism dictate that no one should be convicted by the press before having their day in court, journalists have a duty to keep the public informed.

To date, three 1993 articles and editorials dated Jan. 15, Nov. 5, and Nov. 12, have been published on this case. According to this coverage, the key facts can be briefly summarized.

The assault occurred at an all-night party last January. Before the Judicial Committee last March, ten months ago, the accused pleaded guilty. His lawyer and the AMS prosecutor agreed on a statement of facts, and on a joint recommendation for a three-year suspension. The Judicial Committee recommended this suspension be increased to seven years, but this was overturned by Senate in November.

In none of these articles has the name of the guilty party been printed. Does this not go against normal policy of the Judicial Committee, which is to release names upon case completion, which should act as a deterrent?

Something very interesting is information from AMS Internal Affairs Commissioner Bob Adderley, who stated that a current Internal Affairs commission is forbidden to delve into the specifics of previous completed Judicial Committee cases. Since AMS transition occurred in May, between the conclusion of Judicial Committee proceedings and the Senate ruling, does this mean that this information is forever lost?

What factors are at work here to keep this information quiet for so long? Is it a simple omission? Or are there more nefarious factors, such as pressure exerted at some level by powerful people?

Where is the assaulter now? Has he in fact left Queen's, and gone to another university to continue his studies, as Van Oostrom and Ma did? If so, should that university be notified about what has happened here at Queen's? None of these issues are adequately explained by any Journal coverage so far. The Journal owes it to this campus to delve further into this case, and present thorough and complete answers to these questions.

PART-TIME STUDIES

THE EDITOR,

I am writing this letter in response to an article that was published in Friday, Nov. 26 issue of The Journal. The article titled "Artists Drawn to Women's Conference" focused on a conference held on Nov. 13 at Queen's University, Voices in Art: Tools of Resistance. While the article accurately described the themes discussed and pointed to the diversity of the women of colour who came to talk of their vision of art and politics, the journalist completely omitted a major point which was a major source of tension. There were some women of colour there who were angered to have white women participating at this conference. However, from what I understand, this event was open to all women. I thought that it would be a time to come together. I believed that my participation was a form of recognizing my white privilege and educating myself in terms of dismantling it. There should have been parts of the conference open only to women of colour such as a women of colour caucus. Instead I found myself walking on eggshells, wondering if I should even have been there. Some will say that I should have voiced what I was thinking at the time. Maybe

SENATE RULING, DOES THIS MEAN THAT THIS INFORMATION IS FOREVER LOST? WHAT FACTORS ARE AT WORK HERE TO KEEP THIS INFORMATION QUIET FOR SO LONG? IS IT A SIMPLE OMISSION? OR ARE THERE MORE NEFARIOUS FACTORS, SUCH AS PRESSURE EXERTED AT SOME LEVEL BY POWERFUL PEOPLE? WHERE IS THE ASSAULTER NOW? HAS HE IN FACT LEFT QUEEN'S, AND GONE TO ANOTHER UNIVERSITY TO CONTINUE HIS STUDIES, AS VAN OOSTROM AND MA DID? IF SO, SHOULD THAT UNIVERSITY BE NOTIFIED ABOUT WHAT HAS HAPPENED HERE AT QUEEN'S? NONE OF THESE ISSUES ARE ADEQUATELY EXPLAINED BY ANY JOURNAL COVERAGE SO FAR. THE JOURNAL OWES IT TO THIS CAMPUS TO DELVE FURTHER INTO THIS CASE, AND PRESENT THOROUGH AND COMPLETE ANSWERS TO THESE QUESTIONS.

SURFACING

THE EDITOR,

Imagine what you could have achieved had you put your efforts into supporting Surface before the referendum! Imagine what you could have accomplished had you been out in the community helping the ASUS executive fight for the survival of Surface! The executive were out in the community handing out information, talking to people and showing their honest support for Surface. Where were the contributors and staff of Surface? According to Surface Editor Junipero Lagtapon, he and Surface staff were administering a secret YES campaign. According to the editor, it was kept a secret because of fears that an open campaign would submit Surface supporters to threats. They kept this campaign a great secret. Personally I call it "laying low until the smoke clears" or hiding! It must have been so easy to let the executive of ASUS be your shields in the fight. Unfortunately, shields can only do so much in a fight, what was required were the Surface fighters! It is obvious, by your absences, that Surface did not mean enough to you to take part and fight for what you truly believe in. For it was you, [Daniel] Creighton, and core Surface supporters and staff who chose to hide when the tough got going!

Now, after all that has happened, Mr. Creighton writes his letter expressing his displeasure with what happened. What did you expect would happen if you didn't fight back? Where were you, Mr. Creighton, when it came time to fight? Why weren't you out there fighting for what you believed in, educating the 97's that were not clear on the issues? Surface only lost by 240 odd votes, imagine if you had explained to 97's the role that Surface played, its purpose, and its great importance to the Queen's community. Once again I ask, where were you? Now there is a threat that minority voices will not be heard on Queen's campus. It was NOT the ASUS Executive who let you down, it was you who have let down the minority groups and the Queen's community.

Hats off to the YES campaign: the ASUS executive, ASUS chairs and committee members! Let us all learn from their lack of apathy and strength in doing what they believe in!

Kismet: Staging the Orientalist musical

From January 20-22 and January 26-29, Queen's Musical Theatre will be presenting their rendition of the musical Kismet at the Grand Theatre. The following feature has been compiled to present some insight into some of the philosophical and artistic issues associated with staging the musical. The first article has been written by the Director of the play, Ken Jacobson. The second article, written by Nadia Riyad, a member of the Queen's Muslim Students' Association, addresses some Islamic concerns about the text of the musical.

Edward Said, in his now famous treatise, Orientalism, employs a suggestive metaphor in describing the dynamics of Western representation of Asia, especially the Near East:

"...the Orient is the stage on which the whole East is confined. On this stage appear figures whose role it is to represent the larger whole from which they emanate. The Orient then seems to be, not an unlimited extension beyond the familiar world, but rather a closed field, a theatrical stage affixed to Europe."

One of Said's central tenets is that traditional representations of the East do not depend for their coherence on their correspondence to an actual or essential Orient, but rather on a repertoire of Western codes, conventions, tropes, and stereotypes – in effect, a closet full of stylized costumes. Yet the problematic of orientalism goes far deeper than the existence of gross caricatures. Appropriation, essentialism, and authority are also key issues. Even benign or sympathetic representations, by presuming to speak for a silent or inarticulate Orient, have the effect of homogenizing a myriad of complexities and contingencies into a simple, manageable reality – an essential Orient packaged for Western consumption. Moreover, these representations continue to possess enormous cultural authority. Whatever "enlightened" academics might say, many people in the West uncritically accept the "theatrical" oversimplifications of orientalists as real or true.

When the representation in question is literally a theatrical production, these issues become more intensified and complex. Kismet, the Queen's Musical Theatre production for 1994, is a text to which Said's ideas are particularly pertinent. First produced in 1953, the musical is 'orientalist' in a number of respects. It is a show written by Americans for a popular Broadway audience. As such, it relies on musical comedy formulae and stereotypes: good guys, bad guys, ingenues, temptresses, the triumph of true love, etc. These familiar patterns are imposed on a relatively unfamiliar setting: eleventh century Baghdad. Still, the conventional elements of orientalized fantasy are present in the piece: wise beggars, evil wizards, slaves, bazaars, harems, divishes. Indeed, the appeal of the musical has traditionally been its ability to transport an audience to that exotic, despotic and totally 'other' world of legendary Baghdad.

The purpose of this article is to describe some of the difficulties of staging material which is potentially inflammatory or offensive, an issue still raging in the recent Showboat controversy in Toronto. As the director of Kismet, I have discovered that it is one thing to think about or even articulate such issues and quite another thing to weave the theory into practice.

Part of the difficulty is the collaborative and consequently slippery nature of theatrical representation itself; the meaning of a play like Kismet is produced, not by playwright, composer, conductor, designer, director, choreographer, actor, or audience, but by a dynamic and highly unpredictable encounter among all these elements. Another difficulty is the limitations of the directorial role. If a director hears responsibility for the political import of a production, s/he is also obliged to respect the integrity of a text and the expectations of a constituency. While I am interested in representing Islamic culture in a fair and responsible manner, my first priority is to mount an entertaining theatrical product. Thus, the directorial task is refigured as synthesis, compromise, accommodation: how does one mediate between political, aesthetic, and pragmatic concerns, and still end up with a unified result?

One of the most obvious and concrete ways of moving in this direction is careful editing. Since the authors of Kismet have tinkered with the script almost incessantly over the years, I felt few qualms about making cuts or alterations. To this end, I sought the help of a consultant to alert me to points in the text where the representation of history, culture and gender might be potentially offensive, especially to Muslims. Many of these recommendations, particularly those concerning anachronisms and religious references, were easily realized. For example, the Caliph, spiritual and temporal head of the Islamic empire, is referred to throughout Kismet as 'All Highest' and even 'Omnipotent,' epithets which Muslims reserve for God alone. To substitute for the 'Commander of the Faithful,' the Caliph's proper title, serves to clarify and improve the text.

In other respects, the principle of historical fidelity provides no clear course of action. First of all, Kismet is full of historical inaccuracies. Despite being confidently set in eleventh century Baghdad (1071 A.D., to be precise), the topical elements in the play correspond to no single period. Kismet effectively collapses over two hundred years of Islamic history. The script also plays fast and loose with the political organization of the period. How does one begin to untangle such errors? To do so only creates other problems in terms of coherence, clarity and familiarity. Besides, such changes amount to mere cosmetic surgery compared to more substantial issues.

The women, on the surface, seem compliant and receptive ("Yes Master...your word is our law"); this is the sort of stereotype which both Muslims and feminists deplore.

One of these is Kismet's representation of power in the Islamic world. The show depicts a corrupt official (the Wazir) practicing all the excesses associated with oriental despotism: ostentation, voyeurism, capricious justice, torture, large harems, court intrigue. Conversely it represents the Caliph, the supreme executive authority, as a virtuous, though inexperienced and romantically-smitten, figure. Potentially, this configuration could be suggestive of greater and darker complexity than is immediately apparent. Is there a degree of complicity here in the halls of power? Is the Caliph's non-interference in the Wazir's activities a product of ignorance and ineptitude, or is the Wazir a useful functionary and fall guy? Even though Baghdad is depicted as corrupt, worldly, dangerous and economically disproportionate, no one seems to blame the Caliph, all the hostility is displaced onto the Wazir. In a way, this makes for an interesting and ambivalent dramatic situation, and indeed, the original script could sustain a darker reading of the Caliph's character (in one version, he dismisses sixteen concubines in order to make way for his impending marriage). In terms of historical evidence too, one could sustain a critical, suspicious view of Abbasid power which, after all, was absolute.

To do so in this case, however, would be at considerable cost. Ultimately, the question is not whether the representation is historically accurate or probable, but whether its effect enhances the overall vision of the piece. As Edward Said states, "the things to look at are style, figures of speech, setting, narrative devices, historical and social circumstances, not the correctness of the representation nor its fidelity to some great original." In fact, the more convincing and life-like the representation, the more historically precise it appears, the greater the danger of it being accepted by a Western audience as truth rather than representation. In our case, we felt that to represent both the Caliph and the Wazir as corrupt would be to reinforce a pernicious stereotype about Islamic power, to confirm what many Westerners already mistakenly believe. The result is a more simplified and schematic configuration, but one with fewer objectionable implications.

Clearly then, editing has its limitations. Ultimately, the company must work with the basic script as it is written. It becomes necessary then, to 'reform' certain features of the material through interpretation and subtext. For example, in one scene, the Poet purchases some slaves from the bazaar, clearly with sexual designs. The women, on the surface, seem compliant and receptive ("Yes Master...your word is our law"); this is the sort of stereotype which both Muslims and feminists deplore. What we have done is leave the scene unaltered textually but give it an ironic reading. From their expressions and body language the actors demonstrate that the slaves are only pretending to be compliant, but are actually resistant to the Poet's designs. They quickly turn the tables on him verbally, bringing into question who is actually 'master' and who will be 'ruled' in this situation.

In many ways, the representation of women in Kismet is a more contentious and difficult issue than that of race or culture. There are only two substantial female roles in the show: Marsinah, the virginal heroine, and Lalume, the bored and seductive wife of the Wazir. Most of the other female characters are either coltish, submissive, silent creatures or receptors for male desire. We have tried to counter this situation in several ways. One is through the sort of resistant reading described above. We have tried to establish that the female characters, despite external restraints, possess a substantial 'inner' life, especially the women of the harem. If some of them are more sexually aggressive than countenanced by Islamic ideology, it is warranted because they are neglected and mistreated. In a contemporary production, we felt that this alternative was preferable to simply being passive receptors.

A second strategy is expanding the range of female roles through cross-casting. As a rule, any role in our production without a specific gender designation is played by a female (i.e. merchants, attendants, townspeople). In addition to this, we have assigned several male roles to women.

Third, we have attempted in the costuming of the musical to break out of the 'bra-and-harem-pants-bare-midriff-voluptuous-concubine' look into something more modest, more historically authentic, and ultimately more attractive.

In short, historical authenticity, political concern, and aesthetic sense, in isolation, are all inadequate guidelines for staging a production like Kismet. Each principle has its place, but that place must be constantly balanced against other considerations. For example, in this particular production, the historical fact of Baghdad's cosmopolitan character had the salutary effect of permitting, even necessitating, colour-blind casting. Conversely, while there are no mountains in or around Baghdad, we incorporated one into our set for visual and symbolic purposes. Then again, there are aspects of the material which have a life of their own, which no production decision can contain or control. The song "Not Since Nineveh" begins with the lyric "Baghdad, don't underestimate Baghdad." Whether one likes it or not, this line has a political bite in 1994 which it did not have in 1953. While I am certain that our production contains no submerged political allegory about contemporary Iraq, the United States or neo-imperialism, the interpretive excess sometimes spills over; dramatic texts can be unpredictable and sometimes dangerous things.

An obvious question raised by the preceding observations is, why stage an orientalist work like Kismet? I would like to counter with a more modest question: why not? Is the subject matter of Kismet off-limits to those without the right racial or cultural pedigree (i.e. white North Americans)? Who then does the historical and narrative material actually 'belong' to? It seems to me that much contemporary rhetoric about cultural appropriation militates against the freedom of art and artists, short-circuiting the potential for dialogue and creativity. Moreover, does the presence of stereotypes, even pernicious ones, automatically render a work of art objectionable or inappropriate? What if the theatrical treatment of the piece causes us to re-examine cultural conventions? These are a few of the issues which we have encountered in mounting this production and which we have only partially, imperfectly resolved. But the effort has been challenging, invigorating, and fruitful.

Ken Jacobson is a PhD student in English, and director of Kismet.

THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL • 13

Kismet is every bit a creation of an Orientalist's imagination. In other words, it was written by Western authors for a Western audience, gratifying all its expectations and indulging its fantasies, without either showing much concern for the way it represents the East, its customs and Islamic culture, or even taking the trouble to be accurate in several of its details. Granted, the script was written in the early fifties, and written as a musical, a genre which necessarily presents an exaggerated, stylized and usually fanciful or idealized world. And it is a comedy. Nevertheless, for an audience

Wazir of Police is portrayed as a cruel, self-indulgent and corrupt 'governor,' though at the same time, for comic effect he is a coward and a gullible idiot. His main concern is to marry to Caliph off to one of the three princesses of Ababu in order to secure a loan of "all the gold ten camels can carry." The irony of his fate makes him – he who is the supreme justice of peace – the once-lost son of the chief brigand of Baghdad. And true to his character, he callously orders the execution of the old man to save his face. Even though he is supposed to be the 'bad guy,' it is especially in scenes such as the court ses-on shura (i.e. consultation) and the Caliph is held accountable and may be criticized by any individual.

The second point of stereotyping is the much exaggerated emphasis on the sensuality and eroticism of Eastern men and women. In a comic and ridiculous way, the play invents a distorted meaning to the word 'Emir.' The word (in Arabic, amir) carries both the primary meaning of 'leader' or 'commander' of a smaller region or principality and the same denotation of 'prince,' that is, son of a monarch. In Kismet, an 'Emir' becomes the lucky 'prince' of love and all physical indulgences, a rank which even has an induction ceremony, complete with harem beauties and all the wonders of appetite:

"Harem ladies, concubines, and dancing girls are devoting themselves to the poet's amusement. Clad in shimmering bits of cloth that accent their nudity, they dance for him, fan him, stroke his brow, proffer him salvers of fruit, wine and sweetmeats. The poet seems dizzied with delight." (Act II, Scene 4) This is undeniably very typical of what the West wants to see. This sensuality is the domain of the Poet and Lalume, the Wazir's wife. Right from the start, there are hints about the Poet's amorous adventures and troubles with many an "angry husband", he finally meets his equal in Lalume, with her previous escapades in the "Oasis of Delightful Imaginings."

Unchaste women such as Lalume and men of such calibre as the 'Emirs' of the play may exist. But they are far from being the embodiment of the great majority of Muslim men and women. Certainly, the Western reader-audience must realize that such advances as those Lalume makes toward the Poet are un-Islamic – anything extramarital is, and Islam is absolutely strict about this. The problem is that this is all part of the whole tradition of portraying Eastern men as insatiable animals and women as sensual, if not wanton, creatures. It is particularly disconcerting because Lalume is the strongest female character in Kismet.

The main issue of stereotyping and misunderstanding in the West about women, however, remains the practise of polygamy and the status of wives and concubines; it also touches on the issue of dress codes (and the play's costumes) as well as conduct and behaviour in public.

The first of these is the status of wives. Lalume throughout the play is called "Wife of Wives." This reflects the West's misunderstanding of the Islamic system of polygamy. Although Islam does allow the man to marry up to four wives, this is allowed for only pressing needs and is strictly regulated by conditions of absolute importance, the most significant of which is that he has to be absolutely equal, down to the most minute detail, in his treatment of all his wives, and the Qu'ran clearly states "But if ye fear that ye shall not be able to deal justly (with them), then only one." This in itself is almost a prohibition, seeing that being just is quite difficult, if not impossible. For this very reason, no hierarchy such as implied with "wife of wives" or "wife of the seventh rank" exists or should exist. Now, obviously, some men have exploited this license.

Along with the question of wives, the issue of concubines, a particularly favoured form of stereotyping, must be brought up. The play does not fail our expectations here, for the Poet purchases slave girls who behave just as expected, the Caliph's sixteen concubines are pointed out to him by the venerable Omar, and of course, the Wazir's harem girls whose "supply is practically inexhaustible" make several appearances, dancing and even bathing. The practise of slavery and keeping concubines (basically captive or slave women) was a pre-Islamic one and runs quite contrary to Islamic beliefs of equality and chastity. The subject, however, cannot be dealt with justly in such a limited space, especially because it has been historically misunderstood and brought to watching the play in the mid 1990's, these should not be taken as an excuse to brush aside the issue of representation.

There are many points to which the average Muslim might object. Naturally, one cannot deny the fact that there is usually some discrepancy between the ideal (of Islam, in this case) and actual practise; but, at the same time, there is considerable difference between reality and the fictionalized world (again, here, of Baghdad). Some of the points and objections that will be raised may seem to the Western reader too meticulous or too minor. Nevertheless, they are all legitimate concerns and it is usually these 'minor things,' the things that are dismissed or ignored, which always prove to be the most nagging or the most irritating because of their continued occurrence. The main issue, however, is stereotyping.

Although the play does have merit thematically and technically, the problem stems from the fact that it is conceived of as an Arabian Night tale, including the all-too-familiar ingredients of avarice, lechery, and deception, as well as the necessary positive qualities of sincerity and integrity, and as such it perpetuates the unrealistic image of the Muslim world – even though a medieval one – as that exotic, erotic, wondrous world. Regardless of why and how these elements are portrayed, their presence serves only to emphasize the three major issues of misrepresentation: the despotism, cruelty and Eastern man (and woman, for that matter) and the subservience and objectification of women.

The first of these is conveyed in the play both directly, in the character of the Wazir, and indirectly through the general manners and conduct of the masses in the presence of a person of authority. The

On the issue of women's dress, what else would harem girls wear but harem pants and bras? And how are slave girls to be sold without exposing some flesh? The topic is tiresome and really there is no need to explain what the Islamic dress code is! But the authors really hit the right key when they have two of the Caliph's prospective brides, the princesses of Zanzibar and Turkistan, first appear as veiled mysteries only to be 'metamorphosed' into alluring enchantresses whose sole concern is to secure the Caliph's hand. such as father-daughter, sister-brother, uncle-niece, etc.) Likewise, immodest, erotic or even lightly flirtatious behaviour is strongly forbidden. But Kismet is full of this. One cannot forget the lavish and ludicrous 'Emir induction service'! And of course there is the dancing, some of which is clearly meant to be erotic, for example, in these stage directions: "his gaze falls upon two bare-chested young swains of the city. He motions them toward the Princesses of Ababu. Their appearance breaks up the huddle and the young men and the Princesses dance flirtatiously." Again, the presentation of the two princesses of Zanzibar and of Turkistan to the Caliph is not simply degrading but unthinkable: one wonders if a princess would dance at all in front of a whole retinue and guests, let alone dance in that manner. Of course, the play is a musical. However Kismet does not present an acceptable Islamic environment and certainly not a realistic image of Eastern women.

On the whole, putting the more positive elements, such as the Caliph's and Marsinah's integrity aside, Kismet does present the typical, expected Eastern fantasy which its subtitle, "A Musical Arabian Night," promises. Nonetheless, despite all these objections, the authors must be commended for two things: the comedy and the thematic conception. Kismet is enjoyable and entertaining, both for its comic situations and, yes, in its musical component. But it is indeed in its central idea and main concept that it gives the ultimate pleasure. It is a witty parody of the genre, a type of mock Arabian-Night tale. The theme of fate ('kismet') is the Indo-Pakistani pronunciation of the Arabic qismah, meaning 'fate' or 'what is ordained' and the individual's helplessness in the face of what is 'written down,' which is one of the main themes underlying most of the tales in the collection, is lightly satirized by the Poet's ability to manipulate – though often unwittingly – and even to rewrite his own fate, capitalizing on both his verbal craft and the stupidity and readiness to believe in wizardry of his 'victims.' But does Kismet aim at criticizing human failings in general, or those of the characters of the Arabian Nights and consequently those of the Islamic world?

Nadia Riyad is a graduate student in English. Tickets for QMT's production of Kismet ($8 for students, $10 for adults) are available at the Grand Theatre Box Office or the Queen's Performing Arts Box Office. The show runs from Jan. 20-22 and Jan. 26-29.

Men's volleyball hot and cold

Temperatures from coast to coast fluctuate in sync with Gaels

BY DANDY JOKELOS

The Golden Gaels Men's Volleyball Team experienced extremely hot and cold temperatures both on and off the court this past weekend. Having left plus-26 degrees weather in southern California at 11 p.m. on Thursday night, to land in Toronto and face chilling minus-30 degrees temperatures at 6 a.m. on Friday morning, the Gaels were shocked back to reality.

The Mizuno Excalibre Tournament at York University included #2 ranked Laval University, Winnipeg (#4), UBC (#6), Waterloo (#8), McMaster and Queen's (tied for #10), as well as Toronto and York.

Queen's opening game was against league rival York University. The teams have met twice in league play to date and are 1 & 1, with both matches going five games in the best three out of five series.

It appeared that the Gaels were a little travel weary as their transition game was slower than usual. Queen's went down three games to two (15-9, 12-15, 15-7, 15-13, 10-15) in a 102 minute match.

Next the Gaels faced OUA western division leading McMaster.

The tri-colour squad dropped the first set 7-15. The marauders constantly used fast-tip shots in the middle to keep the defense scrambling. After making some small adjustments Queen's came back to take the next set 15-12. Succumbing to fatigue, the Gaels then lost 2-15 & 5-15.

After their first good night's sleep in 48 hours, the Gaels looked much sharper on Saturday morning when they faced the Winnipeg Wesmen. Although they lost the match 3-0 (13-15, 7-15, and 16-17), the Gaels transition game, jumping, and hitting seemed much closer to normal strength. This exciting match was very high calibre and very intense.

After dropping all three matches in their pool, the best the Gaels could hope for was a fifth place finish and a Consolation title. The Gaels, having placed 4th in the A pool were then matched up with Waterloo (who finished 3rd in the B pool behind Laval and UBC). This 114 minute match was close from start to finish. Queen's took the first set 15-13, then the Warriors answered back with a 15-13 victory of their own. Queen's took the third set 15-10 and appeared to have control in the fourth, when they jumped out to a 7-0 lead. Still leading at 14-11, the Gaels appeared to relax a little and with the help of some great jump-serving Waterloo came back to win 16-14. Tied 8-8 at the court change, the Gaels took control in the end, winning the match 15-12 in the fifth.

This created a re-match with the host Yeomen, who defeated Toronto (3-1) in the other consolation semi-final. This time there was no messing around. The Gaels came out strong and stayed strong from start to finish, taking the 5th place match 3 games to 0 (15-10, 15-3, 15-6).

McMaster went on to defeat Winnipeg (3:2) in the bronze and Laval took UBC (3:1) in the Gold.

As a result of this tournament Queen's has gained sole possession of the #10 ranking in the country and is the highest ranked team in the OUA east division.

The Gaels head off to Sudbury this weekend for a double header league series with Laurentian and don't expect to play at home until the divisional semi-finals Saturday, Feb. 12.

Schad makes 'All-Z' football team

BY FRANK DIXON

Mike Schad, a Queen's graduate who plays offensive guard for the NFL's Philadelphia Eagles, has been chosen to Sports Illustrated's 'All-Z' team selected by SI's senior football writer Paul Zimmerman.

In this week's issue of the acclaimed magazine, Zimmerman wrote, "Schad achieved a quietly outstanding season for the Eagles." Dr. Z, a noted football guru, has been picking his version of an All-Star team for over a decade, and Schad is the first Canadian-trained player ever selected.

Although there is nothing official about Zimmerman's choices, many football insiders believe that making his team leads to formal All-Star and Pro Bowl selections in subsequent seasons. Dr. Z's picks also included quarterback Troy Aikman and running back Emmitt Smith from the Super Bowl champion Dallas Cowboys, wide receiver Jerry Rice from the San Francisco 49ers, and defensive end Bruce Smith of the Buffalo Bills, all four of whom made the Pro Bowl.

Schad played four seasons for the Queen's Golden Gaels in the mid-1980s, and capped his university career in 1985 when he became the only Gael to win the Metras Trophy, given annually to the CIAU's outstanding lineman. He was chosen a CIAU All-Canadian that same season.

The 6'6", 295 lb. Belleville native made history in the 1986 NFL entry draft when he became the first Canadian-trained player ever selected in the first round.

Schad was signed by the Los Angeles Rams, but didn't see much playing time before the Rams released him three seasons later. Rams' management stated at the time that "Schad didn't have the skills necessary to play in the NFL." The Eagles picked him up quickly, and it seems Schad has now proven the Rams made a mistake.

Schad has been plagued by injuries in recent seasons, missing most of 1991 and much of 1992. He finally enjoyed a healthy year in 1993. The Eagles won their first four games before losing star quarterback Randall Cunningham to injury for the season, and finished with an 8-8 mark.

The former Gael has stayed close to his local roots by opening Schadillac Ranch, a cowboy boot store on Princess Street here in Kingston, and maintains his off-season home in the area.

Senators skating on banana peels

BY FRANK DIXON

On New Year's Day at the Ottawa Civic Centre, I experienced my first Senators' game. Once is enough, at least for the foreseeable future. Ottawa lost 7-1 to the resurgent New Jersey Devils, but it wasn't that close — the referee tried to keep the score respectable with several strange calls against the Devils.

A distinctly minor league team performed for fans who paid distinctly major league ticket prices averaging nearly $40 — Canada's most expensive. A small rink packed with 10,500 fans and a $50 million (U.S.) NHL admission fee explain the cost.

An eleven-game winless streak has driven Ottawa's record to 8-34-4, worst in the league by a wide margin. Last season the Senators compiled a 10-70-4 mark with ONE road win. Archives reveal Ottawa is the quickest-ever team to lose 100 games from the (re)birth of a franchise. It took then 125 games to lose 100, worse even than baseball's 1962 New York Mets! Perhaps some Senators' fans should be playing instead.

Ottawa had a successful NHL team between 1917 and 1933, and the Civic Centre beams support eight Stanley Cup banners. In that golden era, hockey was played seven a side, and the Ottawa Silver Seven remain famous. But the economic ravages of the Dirty Thirties folded the Senators. It will be quite some time before another banner is hung in the franchise's new building, the long-delayed Palladium in Kanata, which will seat 18,500. At least if the team played on the world's longest skating rink, Ottawa's Rideau Canal, all those opposing breakaways would be easier to handle!

With huge expenses, Ottawa management must be efficient. But the franchise makes controversial news for everything except winning hockey. Lots of losses are expected, but management blunders needn't be.

Ottawa began badly when they hired city Mayor Jim Durrell to a senior post. Durrell first tried to stay on as mayor while working for the Senators, and couldn't understand the uproar over conflict of interest.

The Senators chose a collection of goons and leadfoots in the 1992 expansion draft. General Manager Mel Bridgman was fired following the season.

Last summer, Ottawa media reported team president Bruce Firestone had claimed at a party that the Senators tanked their final game to ensure they would finish last overall and get the top entry draft pick, heralded francophone junior star Alexandre Daigle. Although an internal NHL investigation could not conclusively prove this, Firestone had to pay a $100,000 (U.S.) fine, and sold his Senators' interest shortly afterwards.

Randy Sexton took over as president and GM, deflecting criticism of his lack of hockey experience with, "It's just like any other business." Sexton's first big move was signing the unproven Daigle to a five-year, $12.25 million (U.S.) pact. Sexton wants to win allegiance of francophone fans who follow the Montreal Canadiens. This raised the ire of NHL GMs, and Daigle made waves when he posed for card promotions in a nurse's uniform.

Alexi Yashin, the young Russian picked in the entry draft by Ottawa in 1992, is now playing his first season in the NHL. Yashin brought his parents to Canada to escape much-publicized extortion attempts by the Russian Mafia. He's better than Daigle, and is receiving about one third of Daigle's money.

Bob Kudelski arrived from Los Angeles to score 26 goals and 14 assists in his first 40 games, a third of Ottawa's limited offense. But shortly after Kudelski was named to the All-Star team, he was traded to Florida for two virtual unknowns and two late-round draft picks. Sexton and Kudelski could not agree on the sniper's contract, which isn't surprising considering the money Daigle is getting.

Admittedly, three expansions in as many years have made new, young hockey blood thinner than diner ketchup. Following a league-wide trend toward defensive hockey, San Jose, Anaheim, Florida and Tampa Bay adopted close-checking styles to counteract their lack of scoring punch. Although this often produces boring games, it has allowed them to challenge for playoff berths. That's more than can be said for the Senators, who don't know the meaning of coordinated back-checking.

Ottawa allows at least 0.70 more goals against than anybody. Although scoring this season is down by 0.33 goals per team per game, the Senators are on a pace to allow more goals than last year. Ottawa could have taken proven goalies Glenn Healy and/or Daren Puppa in phase two of last summer's expansion draft, but did not.

Ottawa's lack of depth must be partially blamed on poor judgment by John Fetguson, Ottawa's director of player development. He is respected more as a tough Canadian forward than for managerial efforts with the New York Rangers and Winnipeg Jets. Although Fetguson has more chins than a Chinese phone book, he could probably help the Senators on the ice.

What's next? Patient fans are primed for therapy, players await trips to the minors, and coach Rick Bowness waits for the other skate to drop. In the home of our often comical government, the Ottawa Rough Riders' management has also been laughable. Is there something in the water?

Gaels hoops squads have high hopes for '94

League opens against Carleton in Bartlett tonight

BY FRANK DIXON

YOUNG MEN WON'T BACK DOWN

This year's version of the Golden Gaels men's basketball team will rely on a fast tempo game. Their aim is to improve last year's 4-8 mark by returning to the playoffs this season. This will be a tremendous challenge for the Gaels. They will rely on every player to contribute in the scoring column to overcome the loss of Chris DeVriendt and Judd Rasmussen to graduation. Look for Queen's to push the three-point shot at every opportunity.

Queen's is a young team with excellent size and tremendous potential. They challenged many strong teams in the preseason, including #1 McMaster, #2 Alberta, #7 Brock, #8 UPEI, #10 Acadia, Guelph (twice), Brigham Young, Hawaii Pacific (defending NAIA champion), and Athletes in Action. Although wins were few and far between, the team has matured substantially since October. A major team fundraising effort led to three games in Hawaii.

Top veterans are 6'3" guard Dave Smart — the Gaels' scoring leader for the past two seasons — 6'5" forward Mike Ruscitti, and 6' point guard Sean Smith.

Smart leads Gaels again

A two-time OUAA All-Star, Smart last season became the first Gael to lead the CIAU in scoring with an average of 29.4 ppg, and set a Queen's single-game record with 42 points against McGill. After only two years, Smart is already eighth on the all-time Gaels' scoring list with 622 points, and has an 80.7 free-throw percentage, second best in Queen's history. He missed most of the preseason games because of a rib injury, but has recovered.

Ruscitti will play at small forward, where he averaged 11.3 points and 5 boards per game last year. Tenacious 6'3" rebounder Les Harold will back up Ruscitti.

Smith (7.2 ppg), a good outside shooter, will frequently quarterback the offense at point guard. Depth will be provided by former Guelph Gryphon Mark Holland (6'1"), sophomore Mike Hale (6') and rookies Geoff Budgell (6'4") and Mike Mitchell (5'11"). While Smart was injured, 6'4" swing guard Wyeth Clarkson came into his own with increased playing time, and was chosen The Journal's Athlete of the Week in November. Clarkson provides solid scoring, intense defense and an excellent feel for the game.

Young forwards should develop

Youth will predominate at centre and power forward. Veteran 6'5" forward Roger Wheeler, an excellent defender who worked hard on his shooting in the off-season, will start at the four spot when his aching back allows him. Two potential-laden 6'8" rookies — Corwin Cambray and Rich Cook — will share time in the post, and should develop as the season progresses. High jumper Darren Dugan (6'6") spent two years with the Gaels' track team, and will see some playing time in the low post. Mickey Slonowski (6'4") was a three-year member of the Ontario Junior Development team, and has already shown an ability to score in the clutch. He should play a lot from the three and four spots.

Barry Smith, a certified Level III coach who is working on his Level IV, returns for his ninth season as head coach. Smith figures his squad can go ten players deep. Former Gael James Reynolds and Alec Murray will assist Smith.

With the graduation of many key players throughout the OUAA East, the division should be wide open. Count on the Gaels to surprise a few opponents in 1994.

WOMEN BOAST EXPERIENCE

The 1993-94 women's team returns all five starters from last season's squad which posted a 23-11 mark, the best in Queen's history. The Gaels came home with the OWIAA Consolation title, and nearly knocked off several top teams.

Queen's will continue the fast-paced, exciting style of play that has brought them success in recent years. Look for them to be very competitive during the season, especially during the OWIAA Championship hosted by Queen's in March. There will be many special events at women's games, building to a MYS-TERY finale. Be sure to watch The Journal for details.

Wilson provides leadership

Two-time OWIAA All-Star 5'11" post Vicki Wilson returns for her fourth season. While a frosh, she won the Alie Pierce Trophy and selection to the All-Canadian Rookie team. Captain Wilson averaged 20.4 points and 9.2 rebounds per game last season.

Co-captain Tanya McIntyre (5'11") starts at shooting guard where she averaged 10 points and 4.3 boards per game. She has a fine outside shot and is an excellent playmaker and defender. Trina Rasmussen (5'11") averaged 8.9 points and 4.7 boards per game from the power forward spot. Unfortunately she suffered a serious knee injury and could be lost for the season.

Def't 5'10" forward Jennie Laughton contributed 10.2 points and 4.3 boards per game last season. She hits her lefthanded shot from the left bank, and can drive the baseline and score.

Jaylene Morrison (5'5") enters her third season as the quick and intelligent point guard. She is an excellent all-round player who terrorizes opposing point guards with her tenacity.

New to the team, but far from being a rookie, is two-time OWIAA All-Star forward Cathy Amara (5'10"). Amara, a grad student, completed her undergrad degree at York. She should score using her excellent speed and shooting abilities.

The Gaels' bench will be counted on to provide scoring and quality time. Three-year vet Stephanie Jamieson (6') can play at three, four and five, and would start on many university teams. Sophomore Ginger Howell (5'7") will back up at small forward where she can use her keen sense for the ball and her ability to drive and score. Erica Hollingdrake (5'5") has improved greatly and will back up at point guard.

Rookies include hard-working forwards Jen Pratt and Anne Marie Baribeau, both 5'9", and guard Kristin Smith (5'7"), who played for the volleyball Gaels last year.

Coach-of-Year returns

A very experienced coaching staff is headed by Dave Wilson, who returns for his twelfth season. Wilson has steadily built the Gaels' program into a force to be reckoned with, and was honoured last year as the OWIAA East's Coach of the Year. Assistants are Tim Orpin (eighth year), a former varsity player with Laurentian, and Janet Swords (second year), a former All-Star with both Ottawa and McGill.

The Gaels made a breakthrough in November when they won their first-ever game over an NCAA school. Queen's beat Canisius on the road, but have since been troubled by injuries. But they have the talent and experience to turn it around in the OWIAA league season.

BEWIC Sports Days Profile: Volleyball

BY THE ATHLETIC CENTRE

Before Christmas, we highlighted three of the four BEWIC Sports Days activities, Inertube Waterpolo, Rugby Basketball and Broomball. Today we are featuring the most popular intramural sport of the '90s, Volleyball.

Queen's is volleyball crazy!

At least four hundred people have joined the volleyball cult here at Queen's. Once you get an opportunity to set, serve and spike with the rest of us, you too will want to join this exclusive club! After all, there is nothing quite like a volleyball tattoo on your skull after a towering spike from that obsessed steroid popping freak of an opponent from across the net. OK, so I'm being overly dramatic, and this sort of thing doesn't really happen but it does provide a really vivid visual does it not? So why not come out and see what INTRAMURAL Volleyball is really all about, because 400 people cannot be wrong.

The 'cream of the crop' on the volleyball courts in 1993 were:

- A Champs SCILOHOCCLA
- A Finalists STILL HERE!
- B Champs MOCKO JOCKOS
- B Finalists LOOSE MOOSE
- C Champs QUEEN'S JOCKS
- C Finalists PHE '93

UPCOMING EVENTS:

Team Captains Meeting.

Do not forget the team captain's meeting on January 18th at 5:30 p.m. in room 205 of the Phys Ed Centre. It is imperative that all teams send a rep to this meeting.

Officials Clinic. Also on January 18th, there will be a short, informative BSD officials clinic at 7:00 p.m. in room 206 of the PEC. Anyone interested in being an official next Friday (Jan. 21) or Saturday (Jan. 22) should attend this clinic.

Nominations sought for Alumni Teaching Award

Nominations are now being accepted for the 1994 Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching. Nominations, to be signed by five members of the Queen's community, should outline reasons why the nominee is considered a superior teacher. The award consists of a statuette and a $5,000 cheque. Deadline is January 28, 1994. Please direct all inquiries and nominations to Ms Deborah Shea, Department of Alumni Affairs, 545-2060.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES FOR THIRD-YEAR ARTS AND SCIENCE STUDENTS 1994-1995

The Faculty of Arts & Science has formal exchanges with the following universities: Glasgow, Edinburgh and Strathclyde universities in Scotland; Groningen University in the Netherlands; and Kwansai Gakuin University in Japan. We are also inviting two new exchanges, for one student each, at Warwick University in England, and the University of Melbourne in Australia. Applications are invited for any of these exchanges.

Deadline: 28 January, 1994

Students must be entering their third year and must return to Queen's to complete their honours year. Details may be obtained from Juliet Millsome at the Arts and Science Faculty Office, Room F200, Mackintosh-Corry Hall.

Queen's track & field off to a fast start

BY BRYAN LAMBERT

The Queen's Track Team recently returned from the Nike-Dartmouth Relays with outstanding performances across the board. After a 9 1/2 hour voyage to Hanover and despite loss of turkey over the holidays and uncooperative weather, the Golden Gaels competed with some of the best New England and Canadian Schools. Silver Medals were won by fifth year team veteran Derek Hackshaw who with his 1:54.61 time moved into the number 5 spot on the Queen's All-Time Top Ten List. Mary Pullen ran a quick 60.49 time from a slower heat to grab the second spot overall and the men's 4x200m relay of Dan Coderre, Keith Joiner, Brian Derby and Remko Noteboom also ran an excellent race to grab the silver medal and Dartmouth Mug that went with it.

Bronze medals were won by Brian Derby, Men's Long Jump, Lesley Morrison, defending CIAU gold medalist in the high jump, Sharon Shew, in the women's 3000m, and the men's 4x400m relay of Dan Coderre, Damien McCotter, Steve Dewon and Derek Hackshaw.

Notable mentions go to Bryan Lambert with personal bests in the 55m Sprint Hurdles and an outstanding 23.00 split time for the 200 relay, Colleen O'Sullivan for p.b.'s in the 55m, 4x200m, and 400m, Julia Ingles in the 55m and 4x200m, Kerry Walsh who made the semis in the 55m hurdles, Steve Fruitman who once again met the CIAU standard in the shot, Todd Jones who ran his second fastest 3000m race in a Queen's uniform and Damien McCotter who had two solid races in the 4x400m and 800m. Athlete of the meet honours went to rookies Dan Coderre and Amanda Parly and veterans Mary Pullen and Derek Hackshaw. A total of 34 athletes recorded 55 personal bests in Dartmouth and a good mix of veteran and rookie talent suggests that the rest of the season will be even better for the Golden Gaels.

The Queen's University Track & Field Team started its season off with a bang in London, Ontario. After 3 months of training throughout the fall a number of athletes got the chance to test themselves. On December 4th the team journeyed to Western to take on the Mustangs and a number of high quality Canadian and American schools.

Last year's Queen's Rookie Athlete of the Year and defending CIAU Shot Put Bronze medalist Sarah Leonard threw 12.43m to qualify for the Canadian Championships her first meet out. Her throwing teammate Steve Fruitman also qualified for Canadians with a gold medal and an 84 cm improvement. Steve has patented a new training technique sought out by numerous athletes. Steve, in his modesty has simply said, "It's nothing really" (how true Steve!).

Gold medal Performances were turned in by Brian Derby jumping 6.74m (incredibly, only 10cm off Canadian standard), Derek Hackshaw returning to the track after a 1 year sabbatical held off a charging Western Mustang to capture the 1000m in 2:31. Geoff Stewart, had a simply uplifting performance in the men's high jump to secure a silver medal and just narrowly miss a personal best in the process. The men's 4x400m relay of Dan Coderre, Derek Hackshaw, Brian Derby and Bryan Lambert. Grabbed a silver medal narrowly beaten by defending CIAU medalist UWU.

It is only a matter of time before 4 runners at Queen's qualify for the 4x400m at Canadians. The women's 4x400m relay team of Sarah McLennan, Laura Hodgson, Mary Pullen and Leslie Bruce captured a bronze medal. Bruce and Pullen also teamed up with Kerry Walsh and Amanda Parly to claim bronze in the women's 4x200m relay. Notable performances were turned in by Pere Repple, Toby Faulkner, Melanie Leitch, and Noa Mallak all of who achieved impressive personal bests at the Meet. Athlete of the Meet honours for the Western meet went to rookies Sarah McLennan and Dan Coderre and veterans Leslie Bruce, Mary Pullen, Steve Fruitman, and Keith Joiner.

The Western Meet clearly indicated that Gaels Track is in fine form heading into the regular season with ten men and eighteen women recording a total of 69 personal bests. The team travels to York on the 15th and Windsor on the 21-22 weekend.

Lost & Found

Everybody is back again for the spring term, lost like lemmings on a turnpike. Did you ever think that there isn't enough Super Bowl hype? For what is usually the worst played game of the year, it is unbelievable how much money, effort and time is utilized in promotion. The NFC playoffs should see Dallas beat Green Bay, the Giants beat the 49ers and then Dallas cruising past New York into the Superbowl.

In the AFC, Buffalo will roll over the Raiders and the Chiefs will upset Houston in the House of Pain to get in the semis. However, that is as far as Joe will go because Buffalo will stampee into the finals where they meet the mighty Cowboys.

For the first time in many years, there is unanimous agreement in the media and among NFL coaches that Dallas is a team that is head and shoulders above the rest of the field in terms of ability and talent. Troy Aikman, Emmitt Smith, Michael Irvin, Charles Haley are the famous players that will lead Dallas; but keep in mind that Dallas has 11 players going to the Pro Bowl this year. In short, Dallas has the running game, the throwing game and the defense this year to repeat over Buffalo in Atlanta.

Now for a few questions to start off the New Year:

Who has lifted the most weight at one time in the super heavyweight clean and jerk competition?

266 kg was lifted by Leonid Taranenko of the USSR on Nov. 26, 1988.

Which quarterback has the highest completion percentage in a Super Bowl?

No, it is not Joe Montana, it is Phil Simms who went 22-25 in SB XXI for an 88.0 percentage rating.

What coach has the most Super Bowl appearances?

Don Shula has six, the Baltimore Colts in III, and the Miami Dolphins in VI, VII, VIII, XVII, and XIX. He has won two and lost four.

Who holds the record for lowest round of golf using only one club?

Utilizing a six iron, Thad Dasher of the U.S. shot a 70 on the 6,037-yard Lockmore Golf Club in N.C.

What NHL player holds the playoff record for most minutes played?

It has to be a goaltender and it might as well be Billy Smith who has played 7,645 minutes, almost 130 hours!

Gaels get burned in California

BY JOSH PROWSE AND MIKE SPENCE

It was chilly at Pearson International Airport on the morning of Dec. 28, 1993. When the men's varsity volleyball team disembarked the plane at LAX Airport, in Los Angeles, California, it was 11:20 a.m. and a cosy 22°C. The next ten days would see the Gaels up against some stiff competition in a state that produced such greats as Karch Kiraly and Steve Timmons.

The team spent the first four days at the Hyatt Newporter, in Newport Beach. After a morning practice session, the Gaels squared off against the University of Southern California on their first full day in the states. Though USC took the match in four sets (with the aid of Canadian prodigy Jason Mulholland), this match was a testament to the bench depth and new talent on the team, as the only set won by the Gaels was done so with rookies and some help from the second string. Although this first competition was intense, perhaps the most memorable moments of all for the team were seeing all the remarkable fights — er — sights of South Central L.A.

Lose the scimitar

FENCERS WELCOME NEW YEAR WITH VICTORY

Last weekend, Queen's Fencing Team braved abysmal weather conditions to travel to the University of Western Ontario.

The occasion was the first annual "Mustang Melee" and, being magnanimous types ready to support new and exciting endeavours, the team co-opted members from all over the country, cutting short the holidays to attend.

The event was spread over Saturday and Sunday and offered events in Men's Foil, Women's Epee, Sabre, Men's Epee and Women's Foil.

In Men's Foil, the top competitor from Queen's was rookie Brad Close, who finished in the top eight. Men's Foil was fiercely contested and host Western swept the top three places.

The second event was Women's Epee. Amy Olson and rookie Catherine Powell both finished tied for third place in a competition that boasted several top-ranked women epeeists. The final event on Saturday was Sabre. Veteran Henk Pardoel placed second and Steve Cobham finished third out of a strong field of twenty-one.

The competition resumed on Sunday with Women's Foil and Men's Epee. Queen's top result was won by Sue Myons, who won the Women's Foil event. Teammate Sylvia Pascual placed third.

The final event was Men's Epee. New Queen's member Dave Williamson grabbed third place in a tough contest.

The weekend was deemed a general success by those involved, the lone complaint being that London needs to be closer to Kingston. It was a good run up event to shake the holiday lethargy and begin preparing for the OUA/OWIAA Championships, which begin in just two weeks. This weekend is the team competition at York and will be an opportunity to observe the strengths of the university squads in the west and central divisions.

The women's hockey team starts the year off with the second annual Cross-Border Challenge tournament at home this weekend.

The format of the tournament is unique. Three Canadian and three American teams will play a round-robin Canada — U.S. series, with the winning side being determined by amalgamated points from the matchups.

This year's tournament will position Queen's, perennial OWIAA champion Toronto, and York Universities against Rochester Institute of Technology, St. Lawrence University (Canton, N.Y.), and the University of Windsor, skating for the U.S. side. Queen's plays tonight at 9 p.m. against R.I.T., and Sunday at 3 p.m. against St. Lawrence U. All games are in Jock Hartly Arena, and admission is free with your student card.

This semester, is your wallet going on a crash diet?

If you're feeling a little fat after your holiday feeding frenzy, it's no big deal. But if your wallet's going to be losing weight too quickly this semester, now's the time to look into Bank of Montreal's new Student Loan.

You can apply for a loan of up to $5000 for each year of 5 years of undergraduate study, up to $20,000 in total, and up to $10,000 for 2 years of post-graduate studies. You'll be taking advantage of special student interest rates, and you just have to make interest payments while you're in school.

To help get things rolling, you might want to line up a potential co-signer. And for more information, drop by your nearest Bank of Montreal branch today. We'll do all we can to put some weight in your wallet, and some "Happy" in your New Year!

Call our Queen's Student Hotline for more information

ENTERTAINMENT

Top of the Pops

Some alternative perspectives on the year in music.

1. Nirvana - In Utero

On this uncompromising effort Kurt Cobain takes teenage angst to a new level oscillating between vitriolic spewings and conciliatory musings all sung over the sweetest sounding roar you'll ever hear. Saddled with the grunge tag, Nirvana's music is much more than a fad, it is on the cutting edge of rock n' roll: real music with real meaning.

2. Smashing Pumpkins - Siamese Dream
Following up their college indie gem Gish, Smashing Pumpkins fulfils the promise of their debut. Billy Corgan creates multi-dimensional songs taking the simplest of melodies and weaving a sonic landscape full of layered vocals and guitars. Pulling no punches Corgan, among others, takes on the indie-rock establishment while exercising his own considerable personal demons. From a band that is clearly marked for success, this album is a classic.

3. Dinosaur Jr. - Where You Been?
If not the granddaddy of grunge (that title being claimed by Neil Young) J Mascis is certainly one of the forefathers. "Out There" and "Start Choppin'" lead the way through a pack of moanfully superb tunes. Even if Monsieur Mascis is an icon of the "slacker generation" and still lives with his mother, this album earns our forgiveness.

4. Cypress Hill - Black Sunday
Basically a testament to the virtues of the "Phuncky Feel One" (a.k.a. marijuana) Black Sunday is an inspired album that shot to the top of the charts this year. You don't have to be insane in the brain to see that rap is now a major commercial force and that Cypress Hill are carrying on in the tradition of started by the likes of Run DMC and Grandmaster Flash and the Furious Five.

5. Doughboys - Crush
Nevermind the rest of the album, this one is worth the price of admission for "Shine" and "Fix Me" alone. With blasts of blissful power pop this Montreal quartet have made a bold entrance to the big time. All you hip-meisters take note: the Doughboys could be the next big thing.

6. Breeders - Last Splash
No doubt about it this is the real deal. Free from the obsessive dictates of Black Francis, Kim Deal shines with an album that both grooves and shimmers. No matter that twin sister Kelly Deal has been playing guitar for less than a year and Kim has a propensity to rub ham juice into her hair. With tunes like "Cannonball" and "Divine Hammer" the Breeders are the justified new darlings of the alternative scene.

7. Pearl Jam - Vs.
If Kurt Cobain is the voice of the disenfranchised then Eddie Vedder is the voice of the dysfunctional. Drawing inspiration from his fractured childhood Vedder has become the martyr for a generation. As for the Pearl Jam sound it can be said that the song remains the same, which may be an apt description since Pearl Jam seem ready to take up the mantle of classic rock behemoths. Yet, even if Pearl Jam remain a safe band their hook laden songs are hard to resist. If they keep this up everyone will soon be in their rear-view-and evocative lyrics, while Peter Dinklage and co. strip down the sound and let the song-writing shine through. A commercial and artistic success, if you liked this, dig through vaults and give Reckoning of Life's Rich Pageant a listen.

9. Rage Against the Machine - Rage Against the Machine
Combining elements of funk and metal, Rage live up to their name screaming their way through an album that is as intelligent as it is disconcerting in its dissection of American society. Coloured by the Mexican heritage of their lead singer, this album is not one for the cocktail circuit: Play it loud and warn your neighbours.

10. Snoop Doggy Dogg - Doggystyle
The year's biggest hype, this album actually lives up to its advance billing and in the process brings mainstream credibility to "gangsta rap."

Produced by gangsta co-hort Dr. Dre, Doggystyle has the street credentials, inventive rapping and catchy backing tracks to appeal to the masses. With potential singles such as "Gin and Juice" the album will continue to sell, but if Snoop Doggy Dogg goes to jail for accessory to murder there may not be a second album.

ROB FURSE IS THIS YEAR'S ENTERTAINMENT EDITOR AND AN UNABASHEDLY BIASED CRITIC.

A year of smashing successes

1. Smashing Pumpkins - Siamese Dream
"Today is the greatest" and so is the sophomore effort by Smashing Pumpkins. By turns breath-takingly beautiful and bone-crushingly powerful Siamese Dream has been known to save lives. "Disarm" and "Today" are lonely planet ballads for life.

2. Sugar - Beaster
Only Bob Mould could pack so much power and pop into an EP. Builds on Copper Blue and increases the thirst for the upcoming LP. "JC Auto" and "Feeling Better" express both the hemispheres and the twin tendencies.

3. Doughboys - Crush
They said they would and they did. Major label and major tunes. "Shine" alone makes Crush as well as my vote for single of the year. "Fix Me" and "Tearin' Away" do as they say.

4. Paul Westerberg - 14 Songs
With lyrics fit to be taught in English classes in Vancouver and a musical maturity previously captured on "Answering Machine" and "Here Comes A Regular" Westerberg's genius continues to rage against the convention of a "singer/songwriter". "Runaway Wind" and "First Glimmer" are spontaneous overflows of powerful emotions recollected in tranquility.

5. Rush - Counterparts
Don't question, just accept. Rush's newest album is their most organic, cohesive and pleasurable release in a decade. It takes Hold Me Up. "Girl Right Next To Me" and "Fallin' Down" are neuron firers and endomorphin releasers.

7. Nirvana - In Utero
"All apologies" are no apologies when it comes to Nirvana. If you can't appreciate it then you missed the point of "In Bloom." "Serve the Servants" and "Rape Me" are jewels of irony and musical integrity.

8. Buffalo Tom - Big Red Letter Day
Yet again Buffalo Tom prove to be the critic's choice but don't bring in the money. Big Red Letter Day should have been their breakthrough. Beyond comprehension while E.V. and company ride the waves. "Treehouse" and "Torch Song" are 3 AM anthems.

9. The Pursuit of Happiness - Downward Road
Apparently forgotten heroes of the Canadian scene and constantly being discovered by the American press TPOH should have received the airplay that bands like hHead received this summer. "Cigarette Dangles" and "Pressing Lips" take their place in the house that "I'm an Adult Now" built.

10. Husker Du - Everything Falls Apart and More
Give thanks to Rhino for digging up and releasing this impossible to find album of the pioneering days of post-punk. Husker Du are still the most important band since the Beatles. "Gravity" and "From the Gut" inspire the whole future of (no)alternative music.

Honourable Mentions:
No Alternative compilation; ALL's Breaking Things; Blur's Modern Life is Rubbish; Dinosaur Jr.'s Where You Been; and Los Seamonster's Andy Foote EP.

1993 Was:
The ubiquitous Henry Rollins ... the inexplicable popularity of The Vipers ... Breeders' "Cannonball" ... the Best Video Only Band Green Jelly (nee Green Jello) ... Michael Azera's Come As You Are bio on Nirvana ... Juliana Hatfield ... being disappointed in U2 and the Lemonheads ... the inexplicable popularity of Suede ... Soul Asylum ruling the end of the year charts although the album was released in August 1992 ... the Inbreds, Gaudi Birds, Los Seamonsters, Mahones, G-Force and other friendly Kingston bands ... Radiohead being "so fucking special" in the face of the CRIC ... Iggy Pop being a less corpulent Kurtz ... Paul Westerberg at Lee's Palace ... a lack of bands that begin with the letter N and X ... CFNY in Toronto waiting on the Molson Park Canada Day Show for not featuring Canadian bands when last year's CFNY show was headlined by the Violent Femmes ... and finally, Vs - further evidence that Pearl Jam really are the Knack of the '90s.

He Said, She Said... Orlando Spans the Ages

ORLANDO
DIRECTED BY SALLY POTTER
PRINCES COURT CINEMA
BY SUE RIEDL

Based upon Virginia Woolf's novel, Sally Potter's Orlando is a film that must be seen more than once to be truly appreciated. Visually enchanting and perhaps sometimes overwhelming, it is also a work which is rich in subtleties of humour and social commentary that may be missed the first time around.

The story is centred around young Orlando (Tilda Swinton) who travels through time (400 years) without ever aging a day. His journey begins in the 1600's as a young nobleman, to whom Queen Elizabeth I (Quentin Crisp) takes a special liking, granting him special favours and property. After the Queen passes away, Orlando falls madly in love with a Russian princess on the river Thames in a sequence that is one of the most beautiful of the film, if not one of the most visually stunning I have ever seen (although I had this thought many times throughout the film). Unfortunately for Orlando, he has his heart broken, and so, after an unsuccessful stab at poetry he travels to central Asia to find a more "manly" destiny. There, in the midst of war, he discovers that he can neither kill nor wishes to be killed, and so Orlando rides himself of his masculine responsibilities by simply changing his sex.

But she soon discovers that the life and "duties" of a woman provide little freedom or relief. By this time we are in eighteenth-century London, where the stuffy and elitist, not to mention sexist, society makes it quite clear that as a woman Orlando has no rights at all, and she must either marry or lose everything. So as not to spoil the rest of the film, I will only say that the story takes us into the twentieth century and only gets more interesting as it unfolds.

Although the film is slow moving at some points, it does not become boring. It is at these parts that we are able to savour the beauty of the visual text as well as collect our thoughts before moving on in the narrative, as the film does cover a lot of information in a relatively short time. For instance, one of the most memorable and romantic moments is a scene between Orlando and her lover Shelmerdine (Billy Zane) where they profess their love to one another. The camera gently swings back and forth between them, like the pendulum of a clock, and thus emphasizes the timelessness of their journey for self-discovery.

All the performances in the film are impressive, but Tilda Swinton's portrayal of Orlando throughout the metamorphosis from man to woman deserves special recognition. She is excellent without exception. In moments where Orlando directly addresses the camera she sums up in a glance the humour and emotion of the moment.

If Sally Potter's film left me with only one thing to think about, it would be that whether male or female, everybody has roles they feel they must live up to in our society. And although Orlando carries a strong feminist message, it speaks to both men and woman. Just as Orlando herself learns, difficult as it may be, we must let go of the old ways and begin to build new ones if we are ever to feel free. Orlando is a film that employs cinema to its full potential, both in its function as a form of entertainment and as a political tool.

Fannies pay tribute to their mentors

TEENAGE FANCLUB
THIRTEEN
DGC/GEFFEN
BY DENNY SILVERTHORNE

Scotland's Teenage Fanclub broke big in the alternative world with their last release Bandwagonesque, an album that was hailed as a brilliant pop album by some, and criticized by others for its copycat style. In particular, the Fannies were accused of shamelessly plundering the back-catalogue of Alex Chilton's Big Star, and for the most part, they took this intended insult as a compliment. It seems that the Fannies aren't afraid to pay tribute to their idols through imitation. As long as the music is good, does it matter that it sounds like someone else?

Therefore, it's not hard to spot the influences on Teenage Fanclub's new disc Thirteen, nicked from a Big Star title. Furthermore, two of the song titles deal directly with Gene Clark of The Byrds, the first called "Gene Clark," the second about his fear of flying, called "Fear of Flying." Indeed, a lot of Byrdian elements are sprinkled throughout the album, including gentle acoustic guitars and backup vocals, and that trademark electric slide guitar, as heard on "The Cabbage."

The first song on the disc, "Hang On," starts with an instrumental of Nirvana's "School," for about half a minute and then descends into pure Byrdian pop, complete with string section. The use of Nirvana's "School" underlines the impression I get from this album that they are just going through the motions, that they've studied up on the music books of the past in order to regurgitate it as their own.

The problem, of course, is that they do it very well. When they play Neil Young's "Cortez the Killer," and then slide into more Fanclub-like territory, it works. When they decide to sound like The Lemonheads circa It's a Shame About Ray on "Norman 3" they do a damn good job. For instance, if the lyric Come on over/Bring some bread/Close the window/And we'll lay on the bed isn't pure Evan Dando, then the vocal melody is.

An interesting aspect of this album is the format, the thirteen songs that are meant to comprise the album, plus six other unlisted songs, three of which appeared on the "Radio" single. Why they decided to include so many unlisted songs, while admirable, is a little strange. Even stranger though, is that most of these songs are more interesting than the album tracks, such as the instrumental, organ-driven "Don's Gone to Columbia," or the closer with its lyrics that explain the Fanclub's attitude to its critics: The older guys tells us what its all about/ The older guys really got it all worked out/Since we've got the older guys to show us how/ I don't see why we can stop right now. (Hmmm?)

Another criticism of the album is the lack of passion in the songs. While its one thing to sound lazy, it's a completely different game when the vocals are uninspiring. While Bandwagonesque's "What You Do To Me" had passion in the vocals, "Norman 3" simply doesn't. And the backup vocals often sound programmed and artificial, as on "Song to the Cynic." For that reason the two instrumentals are my favourites, especially "Get Funky," with its solitary line of Howdy disco citizens and the inspired handclaps during the song.

For the most part, it's the songs such as "Radio," "Get Funky," and "Escher" that make this album. And after all is said and done, this is a respectable follow-up to Bandwagonesque although it doesn't contain the fireworks of its former.

The remaining editors of the entertainment section would like to wish departing assistant entertainment editor, Ian Petrie, the best of luck in his dissertation and search for a meaningful existence. Remember lan: The man can't ride you if your back ain't bent!

Together alone makes for a crowded house

CROWDED HOUSE
TOGETHER ALONE
CAPITOL RECORDS
BY CHRISTIAN DEBRUIJN

You sound so strange, so confused/And your acting so nice it's obscene (Black and White Boy). Please, please what ever you do, don't even mention The Waltons in the same context as Crowded House. Sure, they may sound like Crowded House, but it's just not the same. Yeah, I know all you Waltons fans hate me by now. I don't really care. Now on to the record.

Again another line-up change, Mic Hart is in, Tim Finn is out and on to do solo stuff. Even though he sings back-up on a few tracks and co-wrote one song, there are more rumours of family squabbles with Neil. Split Enz anyone? Also gone is producer Mitchell Froom, who worked with the band on their previous three releases. Replacing Froom is some entity called Youth. I don't know if it's a pseudonym for Neil Finn or a flashy code word for a collective band effort; either way, the production is fine.

In the first single, "In My Command", Finn speaks with the voice of a romantic lover with meaningful lyrics like: I'd love to trouble you in your time of need. But through the song his persona shifts and with passion spits out, It's a pleasure when you're in my command. Finn has been bitter before, but not with the intensity of wishing to control someone. This confusion sets the dark and brooding mood for the rest of the album.

Revolver-era Beatles comparisons are unavoidable on "Pineapple Head" with its catchy acoustic guitar. Crowded House also voice make for a great angry pop song. The title track sees glimpses of the potential diversity of the band. A soft confessional ballad is put to the background of New Zealand aboriginal elements mixed with gospel. I have no problem with the aboriginal music, but gospel? At times it works and other times it destroys an otherwise great song. You'll either like it or hate it. I don't know I'm still undecided.

The problem with Together Alone is that Crowded House has lost its quirky sense of humour that made the self-titled debut and Woodface such great pop albums. I like to think of Together Alone as a more aggressive and harder Temple of Lou Man.

However, I prefer the band's lighthearted, humorous approach over its attempt to cover darker material. This description may be a cliché, but Together Alone, like any Crowded House release, will grow on you. They have yet to put out a medocre project and Together Alone is no exception. If you are a fan of the group, you probably have the album. If not, what are you waiting for?

It says here...

◆ The rumour-mill has it that the following bands are slated to appear at this year's Lolo-palooza Festival: Nirvana, Smashing Pumpkins, The Beastie Boys, and The Breeders.

◆ For those with discriminating tastes in music and the mo- la to make it to Toronto, you should mark the following concerts on your calendar: February 5 - James at the Opera House, February 20 - The Wonderstuff at RPM, March (specific date and venue to be announced), The Cocteau Twins.

◆ Attention Mancunians! If you haven't already heard, The Second Coming of The Stone Roses (remember them?) is scheduled for February 14 (Himm... Valentine's Day? You gotta love it!). The Charlatans UK should have a release sometime in March, and The Dylans will make their sophomore appearance in the near future.

◆ Be on the lookout for Billy Bragg's new full length, Victim of Geography, Orbital's Orbital #2, and ex-Tears For Fears Curt Smith's Soul on Board.

◆ Yet to be titled releases are due from Love and Rockets, The Other Two, Killing Joke, and the early-Eighties mishap, Yes. Her KISS devotees! Look for an upcoming tribute album featuring Garth Brooks (?), Lenny Kravitz, Stevie Wonder (@#*!$!), Faith No More, Nine Inch Nails, Rage Against the Machine, and Extreme (Blech!).

Cervisophile by Ash Baker

A step in the right direction

Molson-Carling and Labatt have been fighting tooth and nail, very visibly, for more than five years. Neither could make any move or introduce a new product without being instantly countered by the other, so as a result we have two versions of Dry, of Genuine Draft and of Ice Beer. Last fall both issued press releases to the effect that they certainly hoped the competition weren't making ever stronger ice beers just to get people drunk faster. Then both went on to make even stronger brews, just in time for the beginning of the university term. Fancy that. Both breweries have recently introduced cut-price plunk-beer in several varieties. Even the various advertising campaigns have been remarkably similar. The problem is that none of this competition has resulted in particularly good beer. Indeed, many of the liquids concocted over the past few years, and copiously advertised, have been insipid and uninteresting, if not downright undrinkable.

It is a welcome change, then, to see Molson throw down the glove with the introduction of two beers aimed at connoisseurs and lovers of good beer, rather than at the mass market. The Molson Signature Series was introduced just before Christmas with little fanfare and a comparatively small amount of advertising. The first two beers in the series are a Cream Ale and an Amber Lager, but Molson intends to add more beers to the series, hopefully by early summer.

Cream Ale is about the only definitively American beer style: a light-coloured, medium-bodied, mildly fruity, somewhat hoppy beer brewed with pale malts and a top-fermenting ale yeast. The Signature Cream Ale is a good beer, if a slightly untypical example of the style. It has an amber-gold colour, and, unlike some other cream ales, such as Sleeman's, it is brewed from all malt, without adjuncts (other grains, such as rice or corn grits, added to the malt). It is 5.1% alcohol by volume. The aroma is unfortunately nondescript, with faint hints of fruitiness and maltness. The beer begins slightly sweetly and goes down creamy and malty, with a slight hoppiness growing stronger in the finish. It seems to have more British elements than is usual for the style, not being especially fruity, and possibly naturally carbonated. The carbonation isn't excessive.

This is a good beer, and one of the finest things I have tasted from Molson. They have not taken many chances. It could afford to be a bit more heavily hopped and a little less sweet, and the flavour is by no means adventurous, but on the whole it is a pleasant, eminently drinkable, medium-bodied ale.

The Signature Amber Lager is even better. It is amber-red in colour, with 5.3% alcohol by volume. The palate is sweetish and malty, with a hint of fruitiness in the aroma. It is very smooth-tasting, with a lightly dry, malty finish, and a distant astringent quality. It actually has many of the qualities of a Marzen or a Vienna-style lager, and I would bet that a Marzen is what the brewers at Molson intended it to be. (A Marzen is a malty, sweetish, somewhat spicy, firm-bodied lager, traditionally brewed in March and lagered (laid down) until Autumn. It is the true beer of Oktoberfest.) Like the Cream Ale, it is brewed from all malt (but with a bottom-fermenting lager yeast), and is not heavily carbonated. Since Marzen is not intended to be very bitter, Molson's gingeriness with the hop is on this occasion justified. Again the flavour is on the safe side of world-beating, but this is not a fault so much as a minor quibble on my part.

The Amber Lager is the finer of the two, and a minorly wonderful beer, all the better in light of the fact that it has come from a brewer that in the past has been guilty of some rather personality-free brews. It is a good winter beer, too, strong enough to be warming, and with enough body to be nourishing.

It is especially important that these beers be served correctly. Above all, do not drink them too cold! Fridge temperature is not really warm enough. As I have mentioned before, the cellar or the porch door are good places, or you could try putting them next to a cold window. If you go the window route, remember to keep them in the case, or inside a black knapsack or somesuch container. The light must be kept out at all costs — a week's worth of sunlight can turn a beer skunky and undrinkable with no difficulty at all. The beer should be drunk cool, perhaps a bit below room temperature. The heavier and more full-bodied the beer, the less cool it needs to be.

It will be interesting to see how Labatt reacts to the introduction of a quality basis will mean better beers all round Molson has already made all their beers preservative-free. How will the microbreweries such as Upper Canada and Sleeman (whose products have been for the past few years a lager and a cream ale) react to this incursion onto their turf? Will they make their beers even better than they already are? Will it become impossible to get a bad Canadian beer? A lot of questions, beer fans: stay tuned! In the meantime, give the new Signature Series beers a try, and rejoice: it's an exciting time to be a cervisophile in Canada. Cheers!

Ash Baker talks like a beer connoisseur, but secretly chugs Blue and Wildcat to get wasted.

Hipster Doofus by Iain Deans Tales of Bald Adventure

This August in a fit of youthful punk enthusiasm gone wrong, I shaved my head. It wasn't that much of an experience really. I simply went to the barber and told him to please shear off all my hair. I used a cover story about losing a fictional bet to avoid the usual questions that one gets asked when they do something strange, and it worked. He didn't ask any questions — he just laughed in my face. It only took about ten minutes to clear cut the forest as it were and I was free. I immediately went dancing to celebrate my liberation from the oppression of hair — and was laughed at by teenage girls. Such is life for the voluntarily bald. In any case I have become used to my new condition and have grown to love it. I have also learned some valuable lessons, which I will now share with you.

If you chose to join the proud ranks of the hairless (Everlast from House Of Pain, Sinead O'Connor, Charles Barkley) you will first have to decide how you want to care for your melon after that initial trip to the barber. First choose your tools. You are going to have to be careful if you try using a straight blade or a razor to shave your head. Trust me, if you have unsteady hands steer clear of these tools, otherwise you are going to run screaming down the street with blood spraying from your head like some kind of bizarre Buddhist monk lawn sprinkler. I guarantee that you will scare small children, confuse animals, and lose whatever remaining chance you have left of meeting the girl/guy of your dreams. I made this mistake the first time I shaved the old dome, and I spent the next fifteen minutes screaming in the shower while pink rivers ran down my arms and shoulders. No sir, if you drink coffee or get shaky watching golf on TV, you will want to stick to using friendly electric razors. The only way you are going to cut yourself with one of those puppies is if you hold that sucker against your scalp for an hour and a half, and chances are you will give yourself a second degree friction burn long before you actually spray the mirror with crimson — but that's another story.

Wardrobe also becomes important, especially during Kingston's black hole winter. I have various mucus-by-products running from my nose down onto my chest because it took me too long to realize a baseball cap just doesn't cut it for the bald man around town during the chilly months. If you are not a toque person, bald and beautiful is not for you. Stick to the hair farm, nobody likes a wind chapped frozen bitten scalp in February. The next big hurdle to jump is the social one. You are going to get laughed at by old men, called names by little girls, and chased by militant Mother Jones readers armed with torches who think you are out hunting foreigners with a guy named Horst. Be sure you want to shave before you do, ask any engineer — it takes a long time for the old crop to grow back. Further, a shaved head attracts few, and I mean few, romantic interests. You will spend many lonely nights with your electric razor wondering who the hell you think you are, and asking yourself why razors aren't better kissers. Hang in there — you never know who the naked skull will attract, and as long as they don't ask to call you "Daddy", they are probably all right.

If you survive all this, you'll be in good shape. Your dome will gleam and so will your smile, at least until you go home to Mom and Dad. No one is more cruel than a parent who thinks you've gone squirrely.

Iain Deans makes up for his lack of hair with charm, poise and personality. Really.

Vids tightens its belt

BY SHARON WILSON

In an effort to avoid a massive deficit, Vids in the Hall has been forced to take cost-cutting measures.

At the end of the fall term, the Alma Mater Society's Management Committee reported that the store would face a $60,492 deficit by year's end if it maintained its current operating hours and movie stock.

A series of price specials have also been planned in an attempt to attract more customers. For the month of January, Rock said, students will be able to get movies for $1 instead of the usual $3 on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays.

According to assistant manager Megan Rock, Vids in the Hall has made big changes in their stock — reducing the number of movies it carries from 1,000 to 700.

The video store was able to renegotiate their video supply contract, Rock said, sending back 300 of the least rented movies "so that we could operate for a lot less — reducing our biggest cost."

Vids has also cut its hours of operation by two hours, and is now open from 3 to 11 p.m. daily.

"Just by reducing [operating hours] a couple of hours a week per staff member,

Former Black Panther makes controversial statements in speech

BY MEGAN EASTON

Most of the problems in the contemporary world exist because society is "devoid of spirituality," said lecturer Imam Jamil Al-Amin to an audience of about 200 on Saturday night at Dunning auditorium. His speech included contentious statements on both homosexuality and religion.

Sponsored primarily by the Queen's Muslim Student's Association, Al-Amin came to Kingston to speak on the topic of "Social Justice in the Americas." He is currently the Imam, or leader, of the international Muslim community centred in Atlanta, Georgia, and is former member of the Black Panther party.

In the midst of cataloguing dangers in society, Al-Amin included homosexuality. "The man-made concepts have begun to produce on mass the worst in mankind, all the ills and the dredges of society are being produced in mass... serial killers... rapists... drug abusers... child molesters... homosexuals... What kind of a system is it that is producing this kind of inhuman being or animal?"

Formerly known as H. Rap Brown, Al-Amin was the Minister of Justice for the Black Panther Party in the United States. The party was founded in 1966 as a black militant organization advocating greater civil rights. Its members demanded the right to carry arms in the struggle.

In his lecture, he said that the Islamic faith is the only program for success in a depraved world. Instead of carrying guns as in the 1960s, Al-Amin now wields only the Muslims' holy book, the Koran, in his search for his own version of social justice.

"Men are born with an inclination to do what is natural," Al-Amin said. "But their errors make them Christians, Jews, and other things, meaning that the environment begins to re-shape [them] in such a way that [they] begin to accept unnatural things as natural."

When asked whether Al-Amin's statements were out of line with the Muslim faith, Mona Rahman, president of the Muslim Students Association said, "you have people with different views and that's acceptable... there are basic things in Islam, but there is room for different views."

Referring to the Muslim faith, Rahman said, "it's clear that [homosexuality] is a sin... sex outside of marriage is also a sin, but we're not going to go around attacking people just because they commit adultery."

"My opinion is that what you do in your bedroom is between you and God," she said.

In his lecture, Al-Amin made it clear that he has lost faith in "manmade"

Muslim leader Imam Jamil Al-Amin spoke at Dunning Hall Saturday night.

Homolka-Teale details available at Queen's

Banned info available at library, on computer network

BY BROCK MARTLAND

A controversial publication ban imposed by an Ontario court is proving incapable of stopping the flow of information about the Homolka trial on Queen's campus.

Justice Francis Kovacs imposed a ban during the July 1993 trial of Karla Homolka to ensure a fair trial for Homolka's estranged husband, Paul Teale. Teale has been charged with various offenses, including the murders of Kristen French and Leslie Mahaffy.

The case has attracted massive media attention, both for the sensational nature of the killings and for the court's actions in controlling the Canadian media.

A Dec. 1 New York Times article is available on microfilm in Douglas Library's Periodicals Room, containing banned information on the manslaughter trial of Karla Homolka.

Further, adept users of Internet—a global computer system allowing users to exchange information, which is accessible through campus computers—can track down not only the banned information, but pages of rumours surrounding Homolka and Teale.

Printouts of pages of the Internet information were left anonymously in the John Deutsch University Centre on Monday morning. The printout included frequently asked questions about the trial, and stories from The Washington Post and A Current Affair.

Law Professor Don Stuart told The Journal that the availability of such information "is clearly contrary to the ban."

"There's always a possibility of a criminal charge, which requires proof of guilty knowledge," Stuart said, though he noted that there have been very few charges so far.

"In the old days it was easy to keep track of hard data. But with electronic software, it's so easy to transmit data. It's obviously becoming very difficult to impose this sort of ban. At some level it seems to be totally impractical," Stuart said.

The publication ban is now before the Ontario Court of Appeal, as lawyers debate issues of freedom of expression and the right to a fair trial.

According to Internet user Derek Walker, who is also the Alma Mater Society's Systems Manager, the banned information is available, though not easily.

"It's pretty hard for your average modem user, who only knows how to use e-mail [electronic mail]. But for those who are somewhat computer-literate, and have a UNIX account [as opposed to a mainframe account], it's actually very easy," he said.

"One of the major problems for the Internet in general is that it's so massive. It's very hard to regulate everything,"

$300,000 computer gift given to Queen's

BY TARA ROY

Sun Microsystems of Canada has donated more than $300,000 worth of high-performance computer equipment to Queen's University. The 12 work stations and one central file-server make up the newly-created Advanced Computer Graphics and Applications Centre in Walter Light Hall. Used by the Electrical Engineering and Computer Science Departments, as well as the Canadian Microelectronics Corporation (a company based at Queen's that conducts research on integrated circuits), the machines are "a level above conventional personal computers," said Dr. Bill McLatchie, vice-principal (research) and dean of the School of Graduate Studies.

Eight of the work-stations have eight-bit colour and make calculations quickly, said Doug Girvin, a sales representative for Sun Microsystems. They are specialized for two-dimensional vector work, allowing electrical engineering students to design circuits more quickly.

The remaining four work-stations have full 24-bit colour capacity, allowing for "photo-realistic renderings." The computers can display 17 million colours simultaneously, facilitating smooth shading and true-to-life "visualizations," added Girvin.

Although they are "very sophisticated machines," McLatchie said, "the donation was directed primarily at student use."

Currently, the system boasts 165 accounts, with approximately 25 consisting of professors and staff, according to Tom Bradshaw, Manager of Technical Services at Queen's Computer Services.

The centre is equipped with a security system with a code that serves to protect the apparatus from vandals. The room is not open to the university at large, reserved instead for students in courses that require the equipment.

These students are given the security code, which is changed every term. Those with access to the lab can enter at any time, 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Almost a decade ago, Queen's formed a strong relationship with Sun when the Computing Sciences Department decided to use Sun equipment, according to Girvin.

He explained that the relationship involved "a lot of co-operation" and resulted in the Electrical Engineering and Computer Sciences departments approaching the company for a donation so that they could teach students more sophisticated material.

The donation, according to Girvin, was a "result of Sun's and Queen's joint efforts." The centre was donated "not as leverage for more sales, although naturally we hope that will result," but as part of "an on-going relationship" between the two, he said.

This large donation is not the only one that Queen's has received recently. Digital Equipment Corporation made a similar donation last year to establish another type of sophisticated computer lab, according to Queen's Computing Services.

Girvin said Sun Microsystems Inc. was founded in 1982 with an aim to put "mainframe power in a PC box," and to "make technologies available to everyone ... in keeping with university environments." The company is "strongly rooted in the academic world — with education still 15 per cent of our business," Girvin said. McLatchie described the Sun technology as a "quantum leap from the conventional PC ... equipment capable of things that ten years ago would have taken up a whole room is now on your desk."

Queen's hosts annual business competition

BY TARA ROY

This past weekend, Queen's played host to the country's premier business competition. The Sixteenth Annual Inter-Collegiate Business Competition (ICBC) was the point of convergence for competitors and faculty advisors from universities across Canada, as well as corporate sponsors and judges from the business sector.

The big winners of ICBC '94 were the University of Calgary and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, both victorious in two categories. While Queen's failed to capture any category, it finished second in three: Business Policy, Debating, and Marketing.

The Chairperson's Award, given to the most spirit, was awarded to the University of British Columbia.

This past weekend was the final round of competition, as all entrants had already gone through preliminary rounds, where 21 schools competed for the top six places in each of seven categories. In total, 14 schools sent teams to the finals at Queen's.

The seven categories of the competition were: Accounting, Debating, Business Game, Business Policy, Labour Administration, Marketing, and Management Information Systems (MIS).

Each category was judged by experts in that field, representing such companies as The Financial Post, Maclean Hunter, Procter & Gamble, Kraft General Foods, and Unilever, among others.

Vince Murtton, a member of the debating team from Sir Wilfrid Laurier said of the final match, "it was an amazing debate. It was fun competing against people from Queen's."

The judges, according to Commerce '94 student Paul Bozoki, financial officer/Debating, have a strong commitment to the competition. "Some of [the judges] have been coming since day one," he said. "No one retires from ICBC."

Don Brewer, an MIS judge from The Consumer's Gas Company, said, "we took a quick poll, and since the criteria to be a judge is that you do it 'til you die, we're now going to be called 'scnators'."

Merrill Leung, a competitor from UBC, had nothing but good things to say about Queen's and Kingston. "I have to compliment the people here—they're very friendly, much more than at home."

Dr. William Banks, a faculty advisor for the Sir Wilfrid Laurier team, said, "Queen's is an excellent place." He added, "it's nice to come here and beat Queen's."

In addition to the competition itself, various social events were planned. Jeff Wright, one of the drivers of the ICBC shuttle vans, said, "it's a competition, but the bottom line is that everyone has fun."

Besides providing good competition and an opportunity for socializing, participants noted that the competition is a forum for students to present themselves before potential future employers.

"ICBC ... was an opportunity for me to meet and bond with the future leaders of Canadian business society," said Chris Best, a Queen's MIS representative.

UBC's Leung said that the time allowed for the teams to study the cases (five hours) was not realistic. "It's more to see how you react under pressure," he said.

With the exception of the Business Game and Debating sections, the competition consisted of a case study assigned to each category. The teams were to arrive at a solution and present it separately to a panel of judges.

The Business Game was a computer-simulated situation which incorporated all aspects of a company. Competitors were required to make decisions and input them as the situation required, with the winner being the team whose computer-company was worth the most when the game was over.

The Debating category followed the formal British Parliamentary style and was judged accordingly.

Chris Asmis, judge-host for the Business Policy category, told The Journal that judges for all the presentations considered content,

SCIENCE QUEST WINS AWARD

Queen's Science Quest program has been awarded the 1989 Canadian Engineering Memorial Foundation's Engineering Students Project Award, with a $10,000 prize.

Science Quest was developed by a group of Queen's engineering students as a summer science camp for children in grades five through eight. Since its establishment in 1988, the program has expanded its mandate to provide science workshops for parents and teachers.

The award was presented to the Engineering Society earlier this month at the 26th Congress of Canadian Engineering Students, held in Calgary.

QUEEN'S BIOLOGIST WINS NSERC AWARD

Queen's biologist Dr. Peter Boag is the latest recipient of the prestigious E.W.R. Steacie Memorial Fellowship for his pioneering work in molecular ecology. Boag applied the forensic technique of DNA fingerprinting to animal ecology.

Canada's Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council awards the fellowship to "rising international stars" in science and engineering. Past recipients of the award include Queen's biology professors Dr. David Turpin, Dr. John Smol and Dr. David Layzell.

feasibility, whether or not the problem was defined and solved, realism, and presentation style.

Commenting on the University of Calgary's success, Asmis said, "no one prepares as much as Calgary."

According to Asmis, the ICBC competitors from Calgary receive course credit for their work.

The winners were announced at a final banquet held at the Howard Johnson's Hotel, which was followed by a closing dance. Both the first and second placing teams received recognition.

"It gets more interesting every year, and every year our sponsors get a little bit more generous," said Asmis.

During his remarks at the banquet, Queen's Dean of Commerce, David Anderson, told the group, "you display very strong signals of integral success." He defined the attending students as a "subset of undergraduate studies in Canada."

Sir Wilfrid Laurier advisor Banks agreed. "These are the best people in the country," he said, "Somewhere in this room is a future prime minister."

Dean Anderson concluded that the ICBC is "a very important event as far as the school is concerned. Not only do the participants win, but also the people who have a chance to organize the event."

Queen's student assaulted

Motive for Princess Street attack uncertain

BY ADAM EMERY
AND THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL
NEWS STAFF

Police are still looking for the two men that attacked Queen's student Adam Lynn in downtown Kingston on Nov. 21, 1993.

The fourth-year physical education student was assaulted by two men on Princess Street at approximately 1:30 a.m. near the Royal Bank.

"I was walking down Princess Street to go to the bank machine and two guys came towards me from the other direction," Lynn said. "The first thing one of the guys did was hit me with a round-house kick. Then they threw my head against a parked car."

Lynn said he was then grabbed from behind and punched in the head and kicked. He shortly lost consciousness.

Although he is by no means certain, Lynn speculated that "the Queen's jacket I was wearing may have provoked them."

Kingston City Police Staff Sergeant Bill Doxtator confirmed that the assault had been reported, but suggested that the attack was a "random thing." Doxtator told The Journal that the two assailants had committed another assault at Stages earlier that evening. The victim of that attack was not a Queen's student.

Lynn said he is quite certain that his assailants were not Queen's students themselves. According to the police report, the two males are both Caucasian, in their mid-20's and stand between 5'10 and 6'.

Both are described as having stringy, shoulder-length, light to medium curly hair and as wearing jeans. One of the assailants was wearing a white leather coat with a black embroidered emblem on the back.

It is not clear if this was a botched mugging attempt. "I don't know if they were trying to rob me," said Lynn. "My wallet was on the inside of my Queen's jacket. If they were looking for it, they didn't find it."

Lynn said that he lost three teeth and sustained numerous cuts and bruises as a result of the attack. "I was picked up by some RMC students in a car and they took me to Hotel Dieu. They may have seen what happened, but I don't know who they were and they never talked to the police," said Lynn.

Asked whether hostile town-gown relations could be the impetus behind the assaults, Doxtator said he found no merit in automatically interpreting assaults of this nature that way.

"I don't think there's animosity [between Queen's students and Kingston residents]," he said. "In fact the relationship has greatly enhanced over the last several years."

While he couldn't speak for individual assaults, Doxtator said that in general, assaults are more a product of circumstance than underlying town-gown hostility.

"We have bars, and people do get in fights," he said. Doxtator said that anyone with information could contact the investigating officer, Detective Constable Brian Debie, at 549-4660 ext. 260, or crimestoppers, at 634-8477.

Corrections

In Friday's Journal, it was wrongly reported that the plan to dissolve the Alma Mater Society Orientation Committee was a recommendation the Senate Orientation Activity Review Board included in its November report. In fact, the recommendation did not come from SOARB, but from AMS Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell, and AMSOC Chair Silvia Lulka. The Journal regrets the error and any inconveniences it may have created.

Also, in Friday's Journal, it was wrongly reported that students taking the Tricolour from Toronto to Kingston had to wait as long as three hours before buses arrived. The Tricolour-riders actually waited just over an hour and a half. The Journal regrets the error and any inconveniences it may have created.

Studio Q anchor hired in Hong Kong

BY MICHELLE PELLEGRIN

In a surprise move, Studio Q co-anchor Sharie Ross has left the program to pursue a television career in Hong Kong, executive producer Michael Wise announced last week.

Ross, who quietly left Queen's in late December, is now working full-time in the marketing and sales department at ATV Hong Kong. She will also be working part-time in the news department.

However, the surprising departure does not mean the end of her association with Studio Q. "She intends on becoming our first Asian correspondent," Wise said, adding that Ross is working on a story about Queen's alumni in Hong Kong.

Marianne Wiesenthal and Teza Lawrence will temporarily take over Ross's co-anchoring duties. A permanent replacement will be chosen for the Jan. 27 and 28 broadcast.

In a Studio Q press release, Graham Abbey, Ross's co-anchor, said he was saddened by the news. "It was a pleasure working with her, and I wish her well with her new job."

Studio Q has many alumni working in film and television, with former students pursuing careers at CBC television, CTV, TSN and various independent production companies.

Although Ross herself could not be reached, her housemate Laura Purves said she has heard Ross is doing well. Purves said no one knew of Ross's plans to leave school.

Ross's goal was always to do television journalism, Purves said.

A person of snow.

Assembly report

BY BRAD ELDER

Last Thursday, wits clashed and intellects tangled as the Alma Mater Society assembled in the McLaughlin Room of the John Deutsch University Centre for the first instalment of Assembly 1994.

Here are the highlights:

WILSON APOLOGIZES

AMS Vice-President (Operations) Tim Wilson publicly apologized for his behaviour at Cloverleaf Lanes in Kingston, referring to his decision to catapult his own body into the pins, and suffer the ensuing wrath of the pin-sweep machine. In a letter read to Assembly, Wilson called his actions "inappropriate and potentially harmful," and said, "the December break provided me with a great deal of time during which I was able to reflect on this and other incidents which I honestly regret. Although this letter can in no way rectify the effects of my behaviour, I would ask that it please be accepted as a genuine apology."

YUK-UP AT YUK-YUK'S

AMS Campus Activities Commissioner Alison Mitchell informed Assembly that an AMS-sponsored event at Yuk Yuk's last Sunday night went awry, when a comedian made offensive remarks during a performance. She said that a contract was signed with Yuk Yuk's to ensure that there would be no racist, sexist or homophobic content in the comedy. The third comedian "made a series of homophobic jokes," Mitchell told Assembly, adding that he would not be paid. Mitchell said that the only positive outcome of the incident was that the audience responded negatively to the performance. "People just looked at him and made it clear they were not amused," she said.

SURFACE COMES UP

Asked by Education Commissioner Clare Fielding to clarify the status of Surface, ASUS President Jen Steeves told Assembly that Surface "will publish again from outside funding sources" this year. She said the paper has no office space allocated to it in the ASUS house, but "does have access to ASUS facilities as does any other Arts and Science student." Steeves also said that the question of an opt-outable fee would be dealt with at the Jan. 20 ASUS meeting.

CHILDCARE QUERY

During question period, Education representative Pete Stuart asked Vice-President (University Affairs) Todd Minerson about the whereabouts of the childcare report. Minerson told Assembly that the information was still in the hands of one of the co-chairs of the AMS Childcare Committee. Later, during discussion period, Stuart suggested that Queen's is perceived as inaccessible to those students with children because of its lack of childcare. "The AMS has the responsibility of making [this] university accessible," he added.

Communications Commissioner Dera Nevin supported the view of Stuart, noting that in the future, as Queen's concentrates on trying to attract international students who may be bringing families with them, it must supply adequate childcare. "As demographics change... we need to be ahead of the game," she said.

In response, Minerson said that "there are people [at Queen's] who are taking [childcare] seriously," but added that any student government at Queen's would have a "very, very, very difficult time sustaining childcare service."

DIXON'S LETTER

Assembly addressed a letter submitted to The Journal by part-time student Frank Dixon which asked why the name of the attacker in a sexual assault case—which went to Senate for review in the fall term of this year—had not been released. Internal Affairs Commissioner Bob Adderly informed Assembly that once the perpetrator of a crime leaves the Queen's community, he or she leaves the jurisdiction of the AMS Judicial Committee and the records on that person are destroyed. Responding to concerns as to why "none of [The Journal] articles have the name of the guilty party printed" in it, Adderly said that while the information cannot be released by the Judicial Committee, "if [Dixon] can get it somewhere else, he's welcome to do so."

POSTER POLICY PROBLEMS PROMPT PROTEST

In her address to Assembly, Nevin called attention to the lacklustre advertising practices performed by the various faculty societies. In particular, Nevin referred to an advertisement for an Arts '95 smoker at Dr. Girdy's, which, she said, conflicted with the AMS poster policy. Nevin noted that the City of Kingston By-Law enforcement agency has started enforcing its own poster policy, which prohibits the hanging of posters on telephone poles.

In a letter to Assembly, she wrote, "I do not doubt that students would be displeased to discover their AMS student fees are going to pay off fines incurred as a result of advertising for smokers and related events."

In her report, Nevin wrote that the lack of heed paid to the city's poster policy makes it more difficult to apply pressure to Municipal By-Law Agencies for increased enforcement of property standards.

WILSON DEFENDS HOLIDAY PARTY EXPENDITURE

Asked to justify the cost of an AMS holiday dinner at the Keg—$575 with taxes and tip—Wilson said that full time office staff work hard and deserve the night out. In addition, Wilson added that the bill was much less this year than it has previously been, "so in times of cutback, we are cutting back."

BAAR ADDRESSES GRIEVANCE PROCESS INADEQUACIES

In a submission to Assembly, Rector David Baar suggested that the grievance process at Queen's is too confusing for students, and lacks a recognizable and definite place to go when they are in trouble. The submission, an excerpt from the final report of the Senate Committee on Student Affairs Working Group on Students and Dispute Resolution, "recommended that the University Secretariat's Coordinator of University Grievance Processes clearly define and coordinate the roles of advisors and processes for non-human rights grievances" and situate itself in a "visible, accessible, central location to provide initial advice and information."

OF NOTE...

ASUS President Jenn Steeves announced that John Richardson, in conjunction with ASUS, will be offering LSAT prep courses to Queen's students at a reduced rate this winter. Steeves said the course, which is normally offered for $250, will now cost $160.

Engineering Society President Mark Simpson announced that the Science Quest program at Queen's won a $10,000 award from the 1989 Canadian Engineering Memorial Foundation.

ASSEMBLED HUMOUR

Upon hearing Speaker Chris Doering's comment that Assembly members may have as many points of information as they wish during discussion period, Rector David Baar, renowned for his multiloquence, was heard to whisper, "I know that." Later, having granted another Assembly member a point of information, Doering remarked, "you can always do that, right Mr. Baar?"

This semester, is your wallet going on a crash diet?

Walker said.
John Johnston, director of Computing and Communications Services, agreed. "People can go out and get [the information] from various sources on the network. It's impossible for us to police that activity," he said.

While a "dedicated news group" containing information about the case was deleted by the Ontario-wide network, O-Net, Queen's Computing has not specifically banned any information pertaining to the Homolka trial from campus.

"It's almost an impossible task to read the whole news group, and say, 'any time I come to anything referring to the trial, I'm going to delete it,'" said Johnston.

He said he was unaware of any legal precedent making computer-line providers liable for information carried on networks.

Johnston differentiated between those reading the information on computers and those distributing print-outs. "Clearly the ban says that you don't want to be in the process of distributing the information," he said.

Various other Canadian universities have taken steps to avoid breaking the ban. But others have stood in opposition.

Last week, University of Toronto's Varsity newspaper published a step-by-step guide on how to access the information on Internet.

At Queen's, Walker said, the information could be found on

"news group files," which circulate among users. "A few months ago there was a group called 'alt.fan.karla.homolka' and this group had information that was banned from publication."

The source, Walker said, "was someone in the courtroom who was computer-literate, and was posting all this information." This person was known by network users as "Neil the Trial Ban Breaker."

Commenting on the trial ban, Professor Stuart said, "we can all be wise in hindsight and suggest solutions to the crises in today's society. He said, "man has exhausted... his intellectual ability to deal with the problems that have been introduced as a result of his own doing."

Al-Amin's speech also stressed that conventional politics and laws are inadequate.

Humankind is not equipped to legislate for itself, he said. Rather, according to Al-Amin, the only true laws are universal laws discovered in the Koran.

Al-Amin told the audience that there must be a profound reexamination of all traditional justice and social policy. Human laws must be aligned with the laws of the Creator, Allah.

Otherwise, he said, humanity will be reduced to "high-tech animals." The key lies in "being able to balance the spiritual self and the secular responsibilities and needs that men have."

Al-Amin said that "you can't that it's turned out to be impractical... The issue of whether all aspects of a criminal trial should be public is actually a very difficult one.

"Most Canadians, I think, would give the courts a fair degree of support. Freedom of expression is not absolute, it has to be balanced against other interests," Stuart said.

Queen's Associate Librarian Mary Mason could not be reached for comment before press time.

separate church and state." Humans will only perpetuate "systems producing a beastly state," he said.

Al-Amin concluded his address by emphasizing the need for spiritual belief that goes beyond "sloganeering" for social justice. In the 1960s Black Power movement, organizations like the Black Panther party used slogans such as "By any means necessary."

"What are the means necessary to establish justice," he asked the audience, "not an ideology... but you need a methodology, you need a practice. So this is what the Creator called you to, a practice."

Much of Al-Amin's speech was drawn from his book, Revolution by the Book. Copies were available after his talk.

The co-sponsors of Al-Amin's talk were the Queen's Black History Collective, the Human Rights Office, and the Islamic Society of Kingston. At press time, representatives from these organizations were not available for comment.

Kismet: art or political agenda?

Should art reflect social reality? Should it reflect our hopes for the way society could be? Or should we perform, produce, and write simply for art's sake? These questions confront us when we examine the Queen's Musical Theatre's production of Kismet which opens this weekend.

When the Queen's Musical Theatre decided to stage the play, they were convinced that it was, as originally written, plagued by stereotypes of Muslim men and women and historical inaccuracies about the play's setting: 11th century Baghdad.

An article in last week's Features section of this newspaper described some of the changes which have been made by QMT to render the play more accurate and authentic. These include avoiding depicting Muslim women as wanton and submissive. In addition, the producers were careful to avoid presenting a distorted stereotype of Islamic fundamentalism in which all Islamic leaders are despotic tyrants.

Many changes were also made, on the advice of Nadia Riyad of the Queen's Muslim Students Association, to render the play more historically authentic. Riyad felt that if Kismet was meant to depict 11th century Baghdad, the activities of the characters in the play should bear some resemblance to the behaviour ordained by Islamic ideology.

Is this reinterpretation of a dramatic text justified? In some senses, every time a group of artists stage a play, they are reinterpreting the original text. Theatre would be very bland if every production of a given play was identical.

It is in fact the job of every theatre company to put their own unique stamp on a play: set designers change the way the play is seen, actors change the delivery of their lines, the musical director changes accompanying music, and the producer and director change the overall look and feel of the play. In this sense, then, if QMT had produced a 'cookie-cutter' version of Kismet, we as the audience would undoubtedly be disappointed.

On the other hand, the sorts of changes being made by QMT in this instance are not just stylistic or artistic: they are being made according to a certain political agenda. The company is not simply flexing its artistic muscles: rather, it is 'sanitizing' a play which it considers to be politically incorrect.

But is removing politically objectionable elements of a piece of art inherently wrong, regardless of whether or not the overall content of the work emerges relatively unscathed by the process? As QMT director Ken Jacobson described the changes in his article last week, they do not appear to alter the plot of the story, and in fact Jacobson argues convincingly that many of the changes serve to make the play more interesting and inventive.

But is it the director's prerogative to make wholesale changes to a play? Some would argue that as soon as we begin to tinker with something to suit the political climate of the time, we detract from the artistic integrity of the piece. Kismet should not necessarily reflect our own society's views about how men and women should relate, nor should it necessarily present the Islamic world in a completely positive light. For the purpose of the narrative, some characters may have to be presented negatively. Nevertheless, we need to base these presentations on individual characteristics and actions, rather than resorting to stereotypes to make a dramatic point.

Those who argue that no changes at all should be made to QMT's production of Kismet contend that we should recognize before viewing a play or reading a book that all art marks a place in time. As such, it should be interpreted by both the audience and the performers in light of the era in which it was written. Certainly we can look at Shakespeare and recognize that the society in which he lived conditioned the way he wrote and the topics which he wrote about. But even Shakespeare's work has been reinterpreted since it was originally written: alternative versions have ranged from setting plays in New York in the 1920's to modern punk interpretations. So QMT's work is not an artistic aberration in this respect.

The final question which needs to be addressed, however, is why did QMT choose to stage a play which could potentially generate such controversy and criticism? It would be depressing to think that artists should shy away from an endeavour simply because they fear the political consequences. In this light, QMT should be commended for tackling a play beset by stereotypes and inaccuracies, and attempting to rectify some of the more serious problems with the play. It remains to be seen, however, if QMT has managed to do this while sustaining an interesting and compelling artistic narrative.

The Marine, His Wife, Her Knife, and His Penis

It's in the papers everyday. It's "the BIG story" on CNN. It's the story which makes a lot of women snicker and every man cringe. It's the John Wayne and Lorena Bobbitt controversy, which continues to rage in a Virginia court room.

We have all heard what allegedly happened. Ex-marine, John Wayne returned home from a night of drinking, forced his wife to have sex, and passed out. Lorena decided to end the history of sexual abuse and in a fit of anger severed her husband's penis with a kitchen knife.

John Wayne Bobbitt was acquitted of sexually assaulting his wife, but many women have little faith in the court system in cases of sexual assault to begin with.

What has happened since has been nothing short of a media frenzy — as each news service competes to reveal the intricate details of this event to a voyeuristic public.

Unfortunately, the majority of coverage has been extremely reductionist. The media has reduced Lorena Bobbitt to an irrational immigrant, with a history of employee theft, who decided to take matters into her own hands.

Conversely, John Wayne has been portrayed as a victim who, although may have had a questionable past with his wife, didn't deserve what happened.

With the attention focused on specifics, the media is missing the opportunity to address issues of domestic violence and abusive relationships.

Why did CNN ignore the sexual assault trial of John Wayne Bobbitt, and choose instead to pay for a ringside ticket in the so-called sensational trial of Lorena Bobbitt? Sensationalism is given up for serious issues — again.

Some would argue that such a unique event is newsworthy and justifies the coverage. However, there are numerous instances of women resorting to the act of male genital wounding, in response to mentally or physically abusive relationships. While these cases remain largely hidden in Canadian court documents, having escaped Bobbitt-like coverage, they too, particularly in the absence of media attention, represent society's and the media's inability to address issues such as violence against women. Whether a man's penis is the weapon or the victim of a crime, the issue of violence against women is still downplayed or even ignored.

TRACK IN CHAOS

THE EDITOR

Bylan Lambert's report of the Queen's Track Team ("Queen's Track and Field off to a Fast Start," Queen's Journal, Jan. 14 1994) is nothing but a trite platitude to a chaotic athletic program. Lambert's listing of the achievements of athletes in Queen's colours may be of interest to those seeing their names in the paper, but it does not explain why and how political differences in coaching philosophy and indifferent athletics administration have torn the team apart.

Over thirty athletes, including the core of the middle-distance and distance squads, and last year's MVP Al Pribaz, have left the team and [now] run under the banner of QUACK Athletics Club coached by Dave Scott-Thomas.

Scott-Thomas and Jeff Brisson coached Queen's middle-distance and distance runners last year, but were ousted from the team by Queen's administration after disagreements with head coach Melody Torcolacci. Made responsible for Queen's cross-country team, they won OWIAA Coaches of the Year honours after leading the women's team to second place in the OWIAA, and the men to third place in the OUAA championships. Both teams placed fifth at the Canadian University Championships at Halifax last November.

At the end of the cross-country season, athletes were told that they must report to the new coach if they intended to compete for [the] Queen's Track and Field team. Many resented what they considered a dictatorial attitude and chose to remain with Scott-Thomas, thus forfeiting their position on the team. Convinced of the seriousness of the athletes' intentions, Queen's administration relented, allowing those that had trained with Scott-Thomas to continue. By then the damage was done. Many athletes, veterans and rookies alike, had committed themselves to the QUACK Athletics Club. This has resulted in the patently ridiculous situation of Queen's students competing under QUACK Athletic Club colours against Queen's University athletes. Little or no communication occurs between the coaches and at times athletes experience animosity beyond friendly rivalry.

Lack of patience with the situation prevents me listing the litany of pettiness that has characterized recent events. Needless to say the sport and the athletes suffer and embarrassment to Queen's results wherever the two teams compete. Perhaps most frustrating is that Queen's could field an outstanding team if differences could be settled. Unfortunately, this necessitates Queen's athletic administration taking action - an unlikely prospect given their reactive decision-making in the past.

Until the problems on the Queen's track and field team are resolved, I resent being told by Lambert that the team is in "fine form" and that "the rest of the season will even better (sic) for the Golden Gaels." The reality is that the team is in confusion and administration is doing nothing.

ROUND TWO: WHITE GUY VS. WHITE GUY

AND ASUS STILL SUCKS! Apologies to Mike Herzog, self-proclaimed "white, male, middle-class ... Surface supporter" from Daniel Creighton, white, male, middle-class, endomorph, Surface supporter with two eyes, a nose, 10 toes, and feet that point forward. Ah Mike, I am really sorry that I offended you!

The ASUS gang did a very good job with the Yes campaign and for that I'm sure that you have the sincerest thanks of a good number of Queen's students. And Mike, I give you points for criticizing me for not taking a more active part in the Yes campaign prior to the referendum. I think you called it "laying low until the smoke clears or hiding!" The thing is though Mike, us "white guys" with all of our toes and noses in order don't have to hide. No Mike, we don't get beat up for being different.

But this being the case, your comments about the Staff and contributors of Surface weren't very fair Mike. Having only one nose and feet that point forward yourself, you probably wouldn't realize that laying low for them probably wasn't such a bad idea. These people are constant recipients of threats. They get beat up for not being what we call "straight". They endure prejudice and exclusion. They are victims or potential victims of sexual assault. The list goes on and you're damn right that many of them want to lay low or hide! You must have had that thought on the shitter. That's where all the best thoughts come from.

But Mike, don't ever say that they're not "fighters". Because a few days of Yes campaign doesn't make you or any other white kid a "fighter". You're a "fighter" when you have to fight just because you get out of bed in the morning. And you and I will never know anything about that. When we wake up to masturbate in the morning we still have a penis and think about women. And when we look in the mirror-holy shit we're still white. Life is good!

So where was I during the campaign? Well I guess I was just being stupid with the rest of the electorate assuming that our elected representatives might have even an ounce of policy-making sense-just enough to know NOT to put a minority question to majority mandate referendum (especially the reps in Politics like yourself). And I guess I was thinking that it's even possible to, as you say, "educate" the 97s on a whole array of social issues in a few short days of YES campaign when the university curriculum suggests that it probably takes about 4 years or more. Call me drunk, I don't know. I better get myself checked into the Betty Ford clinic.

Don't spend too much time criticizing me though Mike. You're not going to hurt my feelings because I think you're all a bunch of SCHMUCKS anyway. In more civil terms, criticism from you is also like a compliment. Anyway, why don't you just admit that the ASSES assembly pulled a major policy making fuck-up and figure out how the hell you're going to fix it. I'll give you a little hint Mike. There's a little problem here called "systemic bias". You might learn about that in some of your 2nd year courses. It means that minorities usually aren't very effective at influencing what happens with major decisions on campus because they are outnumbered 100 to 1. Sometimes they need a little extra consideration to make the whole system a bit more fair.

I have an idea! Why don't you commission a commission? You could call it the ASSES COMMISSIONED COMMISSION ON

Mexico teaches a lesson in history

While Mexico may flaunt its democratic trappings, an authoritarian system lies underneath; the fact that a group is forced to use violence to present its opinions, combined with a brutal government-led armed suppression, conclusively shows that Mexico is seriously underdeveloped in the political realm.

For almost 500 years, Christopher Columbus and his "discoveries" in 1492 have been hailed as one of humanity's greatest accomplishments, where Europe met the New World. Vast and extremely necessary tracts of land were uncovered, permitting the persecuted and the disgruntled an outlet for emigration. New peoples were also encountered by Columbus, who quickly branded them as "Indians," and began the processes of exploitation and decimation in an effort to acquire great fortunes for the mother country, Spain. Subjugating these Indians to the emergent system of global capitalism, their precious minerals were extracted and exported, their lives were whipped and broken, and their lives were mercilessly deprived of the established existence that their ancestors had carved out for all.

These indisputable fragments of history have shaped the development and appearance of modern day Latin America, forcing its inhabitants to try and compete in the global economy, unable to evolve at their own pace. History is, in most cases, a written record for all of us to examine and analyze, and one would hope that we could learn from our past blunders to ensure that the darker shades of history will never reoccur.

Perhaps the history books that circulate in current day Mexico are filled with holes, or perhaps many Mexicans have never read such a text. Certainly, most of the Mexican populace knows that a Revolution ravaged the nation for over seven years beginning in 1910, in an attempt to close the gap between the few wealthy and the many impoverished. Initially following the revolutionary course to the left of the political spectrum where Mexico attempted to develop domestically, its leaders became frustrated when they looked to the north and saw the resplendent riches of the United States and Canada. As Mexico patterned itself on Spain's example in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the Mexico of the 1940s saw fit to copy the world's economic leader, the U.S. This aspiration of becoming a progressive and wealthy nation is steadily becoming a reality, as the initiation of NAFTA will continue to spur North American-style development.

Hame-grown Mexican capitalists reacted with delight to the new trade pact. Recognizing the potential of low tariffs between mineral-rich Mexico and its northern neighbours, they scurried toward their President, Carlos Salinas de Gotari, for industrial concessions. And Salinas, who has definitely never read any indigenous history, was eager to please the class that would bring Mexico to economic prosperity. In a federal planning room in Mexico City, a pencil slashed over great amounts of land on a map, designating these tracts for agri-business ventures. Did it really matter that those lands were already occupied by an indigenous people who had harvested the land since the times of the Mayans? I guess certain sacrifices have to be made to become a robust nation, and if that includes throwing Indians off the land that has always been theirs, so be it.

Progress, the ethos of the modern world, has firmly etched its form in Salinas' vision of Mexico. In all probability, he felt that those Indians would rejoice in Mexico's latest development scheme, because this development is meant for all of Mexico's inhabitants to share. What Salinas has remained ignorant of, though, is that the natives of Mexico's South had learned the lessons of history. In Chiapas State, the natives have become determined to act aggressively against this injustice, and not sit passively as their ancestors did 500 years ago. Calling upon the will and might of Emiliano Zapata, a fearless peasant leader during the Revolution that sought land for the poor, a guerrilla group named the Zapatistas was born.

They symbolically began their fight on the day of NAFTA's inauguration, quickly seizing several towns to violently show their opinion on Mexico's path to development. Upset that guerrilla activity could occur in a democracy such as Mexico, Salinas sought a rapid defeat of the guerrillas, relying on the Latin American tradition of terrorizing and killing civilians that might become guerrilla supporters in a blatant violation of human rights.

Disjointed Lives

Pigs in Heaven
Barbara Kingsolver
Harper Collins
343 pgs.
$29.50

Readers familiar with Barbara Kingsolver's last novel The Bean Trees, will recognize Taylor Greer, a woman who unexpectedly became a mother when a stranger left an abused, native child in her car.

In Pigs in Heaven, Kingsolver uses a lighthearted but sensitive manner to address the concerns of native-American people who have been deprived of their own culture by socialization in white society.

When Taylor's six-year-old child Turtle appears on an Oprah Winfrey show featuring remarkable children rescuers, she accidentally catches the attention of a Cherokee Nation lawyer. Annawake Fourkiller has personal reasons for her mission to save Turtle from the ill effects of being unaware of the Cherokee ways.

After finding Taylor, Fourkiller claims that under the Indian Child Welfare Act, the tribe makes the final verdict in adoptions. As the Cherokee Nation had not authorized Turtle's adoption, Taylor's position as mother is suddenly threatened.

In a mindless fear that she may lose her daughter, a terrified Taylor Greer flees from her Tucson home instead of facing the dilemma. Her westward excursion along the backroads of Arizona and Nevada makes the novel read like a road-movie in which she meets other quirky characters in odd places, such as the tacky Delta Queen Casino, Queen Bee's Pancake House, and laundromats lined with slot machines.

Along the way, Taylor picks up a waitress named Barbie who models her life on the famous doll of the same name. However, Taylor soon discovers the unexpected beyond Barbie's obsession with matching apparel ensembles and conditioning routines.

Although having an eye for specific details of other people, sometimes even imaginatively creating lives for strangers, Taylor is almost blind to her own self. In a statement more like an afterthought, she says she's "supposed to be part Indian herself." We wonder if she has ever tried to figure this out.

For most of their lives, Taylor and her mother have believed women do not need men. However, their independence could also be viewed as self-imposed isolation resulting from not identifying with their ancestral roots. Although Kingsolver's central characters appear detached from each other, they share the effects of white socialization. They are caught in what Taylor refers to as "the Twilight Zone of Humanity."

One of the few significant male characters is Cash, a Cherokee man who sadly suffers from the disillusionment of living in white society. He makes beads for his lady friend to use in her job. Rose is exploited daily as she sits in the Trading Post window, pretending to be making beads as tourists look at her to satisfy their curiosity by watching an authentic "Indian woman" engaged in making handicrafts.

With Cash's concern over the fate of pigeons threatened by pesky hunters, we sense his identification with their plight. In his opinion, the pigeon "is not a natural bird, it's lived in cities so long, it's like a wee bird." When Cash finally takes flight, we are relieved as if we have witnessed a bird escape unharmed.

Although Kingsolver addresses some serious issues, she refrains from attempting to solve them. However, Kingsolver sensitively explores both sides of the moral dilemma. Should a child remain in the custody of her mother, or return to her Cherokee reservation to learn of her ancestral ways while quite possibly being subjected to poverty and neglect?

Pigs in Heaven is a uniquely written, lively and witty novel. A sense of mystery running through the novel holds our suspense as we continually try to solve the riddle of how the characters' seemingly disjointed lives are intertwined. Although lacking a strong climax, the final shaping of Turtle's destiny is thoughtfully crafted.

th last photo uv th human soul bill bissett
Talorbooks
144 pgs.

It happened to pick up bill bissett's latest poetry collection th last photo uv th human soul at the same time I bought his 1970 classic pomes for yoshi.

Over the course of 23 years a poet is bound to change -- especially a poet that usually publishes two books of poetry a year -- but the contrast between these two books was more striking than I expected.

A short series of lyrical pomes dealing with the absence of a lover, the pomes in yoshi were concisely crafted, clearly expressed and beautifully contrasted. Mixing the language and experience of the "hippie culture" in a non-contrived way with the Renaissance love sonnet tradition, yoshi was different than most of bissett's earlier radical experimentations in syntax, collage and typography with blewint-mpress.

th last photo uv th human soul is far from yoshi in both its intent and the way that it succeeds in its goals. While yoshi perfectly conveyed bissett's feelings of love, th last photo is all over the map politically and emotionally. Ranging from radical environmentalism to passive resistance and erotic love to pure hatred, bissett's concerns and ways of addressing them come as no surprise to readers of his last few books.

It is quite apparent that for the last few years and in the books that include hard 2 beleeve, canada geez, mate for life, and inkor-rect thots, bissett has been quite content to follow the same pome patterns and themes. All three collections contain pretty much the same mixture of line drawings, a few concrete "tapestry" pomes, a few "chant" pomes, and the rest free-flowing rants about sex, politics, injustice and the environment in non-syntactic and "misspelled" language. th last photo doesn't stray far from these elements. Not that that's a bad arrangement of poetics (and it is much more exciting and innovative than sooooo many contemporary poets both older and younger than bissett) -- it's just that this collection seems a little more complacent than the volumes that preceded it. Indeed, th last photo lacks the humour of hard 2 beleeve, the good-naturedness of canada geez, and the sharp politics of inkor-rect thots.

The only thing that can be said to be "different" about th last photo is that it is structured around three long interrelated pomes entitled "blur street." All three are extremely dense visually and are very anti-reader in the way that they are printed in single-spaced, closely compacted text and are laid out so that they take up the whole page. The emotion behind the pomes is primarily anger, but the targets are disjointedly tied between the Tory government, the AIDS crisis, environmental pillage and the like without closing in on a central concern. While this may create a pre-apocalyptic/millennial feeling of an impending deluge, it is more likely to cause reader-overload as opposed to desire to change social conditions.

Formally, "blur street" is strongest at the end of each canto with bissett's chant of B B B L L L U U U R R R I I I N N N N G G G ... blur up blur up blur up blur up, recalling bpNichol's take on Bloor Street at the beginning of The Martyrology Book 6: bluel bluel bloor, and is a chance for bissett to return the favour as Nichol quoted bissett to begin both Books 2 and 4 of The Martyrology: purpose is a porpoise.

On themes similar to "blur street" pomes like "whet did my dott go" which is basically the repetition in capital letters of OKA OKA OKA GST GST GST FTA lack the subtlety and power of such classic bissett political tracts as "Killer Whale" (from Lost Angel Mining Company) or much of the cleverness exhibited in inkor-rect thots. And much of this volume contains the same sort of problems -- long, densely printed material, and a lack of humour and focus.

Some worthy additions to the bissett canon would include "thees scots wer sittin around in scotland wet" which explores war and the origin of the surname "bissett" in a comic way; "yu wanta know something reelee horrfying" for its black humour; and the moving "my big sistr is dancing," which deals with the death of bissett's sister while he is on a reading tour in Europe and his return for her funeral.

Although th last photo (and much of bissett's recent work) lacks the collage experimentation of the past, "morrisey at maypul leef gardens" contains a photocopy of a ticket stub from a Morrissey concert in Toronto mixed into the text. Interestingly, it's also the most entertaining pome in the book, for it is fascinating to see bissett's reactions to modern music, as he himself is a musician (with the Manhattan Massacre) and a veteran of the '60s folk scene in North America. He writes: eye see morrisey dancing i heer morrisey singing hes so great peopl fall on me they rush thd th stage i get squishd bhind a chair i dont care all th negative thinking stops i dont remembr whos suspisyus uv who all th bullets in all th world miss theyr targets no whun can hurt us ...

These bright moments, however, are few and far between. Again, reading bissett is much more of an adventure than much of contemporary poetry, but it is also a run through a jungle which fans of his have been in many times before. Critic Len Early has remarked that reading the works of bissett is like exploring sunken ships -- it is unfortunate that in th last photo uv th human soul there is more flotsam and jetsam than buried treasure.

Roman Candles

Send me spinning naked, white-hot, flashing mad above your skies
 Follow close upon my wake across the careful woven blanket of the stars.

Those that watch
 are left but clapping Craning necks and eyes rolled back
 Praying for a glimpse Of two Roman Candles escaped in flame from the bloated choking hand of lonely night.

Like Omar's guests, I am star-scattered through the universe;
 like the twelve tribes, I am gone into all the world and lost;
 like all the stars, I am all around yet so far from you.

I reach out to you from everywhere and from nowhere, hope you are whole and real as I reach with all of me for you who can touch all my parts and gather them in.

For you who can make me whole as I have never done,
 I reach out through all eternity and all longing, but it seems that you, all star-scattered, have left yourself.

Heralds

The stillness of near dawn unnaturally conscious hours when rooms and thoughts are frozen like chess games galvanized in glaciers, reverberating past themselves like blurred bells Impossible to imagine what has brought me to this hour, to take inventory of one moment over the other as if what is most obvious in our lives flares the silence and stillness and not the other way around These quiet pre-dawn hours are infamous for fantasies and doubts and whatever doesn't quite fit anywhere else
 A fine time for seagulls and squirrels and sub-human cartoon beasts to inherit the roads and the nourishment of punctured pinata garbage games
 Until cars and working hours return the world to a traffic which kills whatever still stays still Nothing moves now as I write this except my hand and the smooth snoring of the neighbours that sound like pearl necklaces pulled out of nostrils next door
 When morning comes either light will fill this room like a bloody stream swishing through catacombs of a hypnotized heart -- beating like cocks plumed with gasoline in every seat of the opera or, more likely, nothing shall be heralded nor prevent us from continuing whatever it was we began in darkness

Women hoopsters overcome injuries, win opener 60-39

Captains Wilson, McIntyre lead way

BY FRANK DIXON

The Queen's women's basketball Gaels came up with a gallant effort in their opening OWIAA league game in Bartlett Gym on Friday night. Playing without three of their top six players for more than half the game, the Gaels (1-0) defeated the Carleton Ravens (0-2) by 60-39 before an enthusiastic crowd of 500 fans.

Queen's began the game without power forward Trina Rasmussen (season-ending knee injury) and point guard Jaylene Morrison. Then, with five minutes left in the first half, experienced forward Cathy Amara left after hurting her knee. Head coach Dave Wilson had to make many adjustments, but to their credit, the Gaels — especially their bench players — came up with a strong defensive effort in what turned out to be a very scrappy game.

The Gaels needed big games from their key players Vicki Wilson and Tanya McIntyre, and the two co-captains really came through. Wilson achieved a double-double, hitting for 28 points (19 in the first half), and grabbing 10 rebounds. The Gaels' star must have remembered last season's final game when Carleton, aided by many uncalled fouls, held Wilson to a season-low seven points, costing her the OWIAA scoring title. Wilson certainly made up for that game on Friday.

McIntyre had an incredible all-around game — 6 points, 5 recoveries, 4 assists, 3 rebounds, and an astounding 11 blocked shots. She also frustrated many Ravens' passing attempts. Now that Michael Jordan has retired from the NBA, his spot on the All-Defensive team is vacant, and McIntyre surely impressed any selectors who were present. McIntyre is probably the top defensive player in the OWIAA.

Queen's jumped out to a quick 10-point lead, expanded the margin to 34-20 at the half, and were never seriously challenged after that. Carleton didn't help their cause by shooting an abysmal 4-for-31 from the floor before the break. The Ravens shot a little better in the second half, finishing with a still sub-par 12-for-56. Carleton's team leaders were Helen Collins with 11 points, and Erin O'Grady with 10. The Ravens were shutting down Jenny Laughton's flank game, but Laughton (4 points) simply dished off six lob-pass assists to Wilson for back-door layups. Amara hit 6 before her injury. Erica Hollingdrake made her first career start at the point in place of Morrison. Hollingdrake played the entire second half, generally made good decisions when she led the attack, and came up with a particularly strong defensive game. She added four points. Rookie Melanie Leitch was pressed into service for her first OWIAA game, and made a useful contribution with four points.

The Gaels get right back to it tonight in Bartlett when they meet the Ottawa Gee-Gees at 6 p.m. Queen's has already defeated the Gee-Gees in pre-season action.

There will be a Cheer Leading Contest for free pizza during this game, so be sure to come out, show your support for the Gaels, and fill your face!

Take dead aim: Cathy Amara (10) pulls up for a short jumper against Carleton during Friday's game.

BRENT DAVIS

Men blow 13-point lead, drop basketball league opener

BY FRANK DIXON

The Queen's Golden Gaels couldn't stand prosperity in their opening league game of the 1994 OUAA season. With nine minutes left, the Gaels (0-1) had a 13-point lead at 63-50 over the Carleton Ravens (2-1), but they choked that and more away before finally falling 80-75 before a disappointed crowd of 700 fans in Bartlett Gym.

This was a tragic outcome, because Queen's had played very well and were full value for their commanding position. But in the space of less than two minutes, Carleton blitzed the stunned Gaels for ten points to draw within three after being outplayed for most of the game. Several turnovers, dumb fouls and lax rebounding by Queen's presented Carleton with golden chances.

Although the opportunistic Ravens took full advantage of the Queen's lapse, some curious strategy by Gaels' head coach Barry Smith contributed substantially to the eventual result. Coach Smith kept his two big 6'8" rookie post players — Corwin Cambrey and Rich Cook — on the bench for the last ten minutes, and this allowed the young Ravens, led by Gaels-killer Taffe Charles, to dominate the glass at both ends of the floor. Smith's game-ending plan — going with his experienced players — was understandable, but he gave away his team's size advantage over the smaller and more inexperienced Ravens. It's worth noting that for virtually all of the game's first 30 minutes, when Cambrey and Cook alternated in the post, the Gaels' lead topped eight points, including a 14-point margin during the first half and a 43-33 advantage at halftime. But when the big men sat down, the lead evaporated.

Since beating the University of New Brunswick on Oct. 29, the Gaels have lost 14 straight games. Despite the adversity, the young Queen's team is maturing, and the Carleton game represented their best chance to break this awful streak.

Unfortunately, several fine performances by Queen's players were wasted. Wyeth Clarkson (career-high 25 points) and Dave Smart (22) both played valiantly. Reserve point guard Mark Holland saw increased time and responded with six points and good decisions. Forwards Roger Wheeler and Mickey Slonowski each added five rebounds, and Cambrey and Cook contributed usefully.

For the Ravens, Charles enjoyed his usual dominant game, hooping a game-high 30 points and leading all players with 13 rebounds. Last season Charles, one of only two Ravens with more than two years of varsity experience, lit up the Gaels for 31 points in Ottawa. Carleton guard Reagh Vidito enjoyed unmet success from beyond the three-point arc, hitting 19 points.

It's back to the drawing board tonight for the Gaels when they meet defending OUAA champion Ottawa Gee-Gees at 8 p.m. in Bartlett Gym. The Gee-Gees have lost several key players to graduation, including 6'8" centre Chris Lemcke and hot-dog shooting guard Rod Lee, but should still present a good challenge. Hopefully the Gaels can get the monkey off their backs and post their first win of 1994.

The Gaels could really use a return to form by co-captain Mike Ruscitti, whose recent play has lacked its usual confidence and intensity. Ruscitti's often brilliant play of last season, featuring clutch scoring, rebounding and shut-down defense, would provide a much-needed spark.

BY JOEL SUTHERLAND

On Saturday, Buffalo beat the Raiders 29-23 in a manner that is not atypical of a Super Bowl bound (according to the experts) team. After the fact, it is easy to say that the Raiders never stood a chance in frigid Rich Stadium weather; however, the Raiders did stand a chance all the way through the game and even looked like they might pull it off heading into the fourth quarter. Nonetheless, it was not to be. L.A.'s day, despite the amazing Tony Brown sine-wave run into the end zone. Inasmuch as everyone hates to admit it, Kelly played well and Hostetler played like a Hoss — never staying in the pocket and scrambling around like eggs on a hot plate.

The Raiders exit early in the playoffs again. Art Shell and Jeff Hostetler will most likely return next year, but the team will have to make off-season improvements on their defensive line (i.e. ensure that Howie Long understands the fine points of the off-side rule).

NFL Headline News

The victorious Bills look ahead to host Joe Montana and the Chiefs. Look for Buffalo to convincingly beat K.C. in ongoing freezing weather. Keep in mind that Kansas has not had a rest (unlike the Bills) and that Kansas City will not practice more than two days (most likely one) in the cold. The ever amazing Joe Montana does not have the supporting cast he enjoyed in San Francisco (Rice, Craig, Lott, Haley, Millen, Young...), nor have the Chiefs, as a team, experienced advancing this far in the playoffs since the glory days of the AFL when they beat the Raiders 17-7 in 1969.

The Chiefs, however, did upset the Oilers in the House of Pain on Sunday by a score of 28-20. Heading into the second-half with the score 10-0 Oilers, the Chiefs looked terrible. Schottenheimer must have talked up a storm in the locker room because Kansas stormed back to take the lead 21-13 late in the half. K.C.'s victory was capped off by a Marcus Allen run that left Buddy Ryan's defense sucking their thumbs.

NFC action on Saturday saw the 49ers playing host to the Giants who got their butts whipped 44-3. Many people felt New York would beat an Fran hands down.

The lack of rest, the age of Simms and L.T., the injury absence of Jumbo Elliot, the instability that the organization has been through over the last two years with respect to the departure of Parcells and the immediate emergence of a quarterback controversy, all of these and other factors add up in retrospect; but retrospect is looking back.

Excuses can be found at every turn to explain failure, but Dan Reeves did an amazing job with a cast that was predicted to go nowhere this year. Perhaps the Giants went as far as they did to prove to themselves that the last two poor seasons under Ray Handley were not their fault. Regardless, Dallas fans should worry more now that San Fran plays the Cowboys next, New York would have been cannon fodder but the 49ers are hot. Dallas will beat San Francisco, but if Young and Rice/Taylor connect and Waters is on his running game, it will be close.

Sunday NFC action saw Dallas roll over the Packers 27-17 (Favre threw a touchdown to Sharpe with under a minute left to play, so for all intents and purposes, the Cowboys won by 17 points instead of 10).

There were a few surprises in this game, notably the flubbed punt and Emmitt Smith going down and sitting out the rest of the game. Smith stated that he was ready to go back on the field after two plays of sitting off; but Johnson refused to risk Smith further. When asked if he would be ready to play, Smith replied "I'll be ready for the 49ers."

Predictions: AFC Championship — Buffalo over Kansas City (score: 34-21). NFC Championship — Dallas over San Francisco (score: 24-17). Record: 3/4.

Looking back on '93

BY JUSTIN MCKELLAR

Nobody profits by living in the past, but there's no harm in turning a fond eye back upon the successes in the past year of Canadian sport. Here's a written hi-lite reel. For maximum effect, read this with the inspiring soundtrack to Charions Of Fire playing in the background.

First, our unofficial national sport. The NHL celebrated its 75th birthday, and as if it were scripted for the historic occasion, the Montreal Canadiens won the Stanley Cup for the 23rd time in league history. The Canadiens reflect the glorious tradition of the NHL better than any other team. In the final against the Kings, they represented this tradition against the insurgent new order from south of the border, and they aptly clinched victory in the mecca of hockey. Sure, the final was a little boring, but the fans made up for it after the last game.

Canada's other historic team enjoyed a rebirth of sorts. The Toronto Maple Leafs made it to the playoffs and then played with the tenacity of starved wolves. They toppled the favoured and deeply talented Red Wings, then tamed Cuzo and the St. Louis Blues before the wearied Budis bowed to the Kings in seven. Series MVP considerations go to Kerry Fraser, a deciding force in game seven. Did you know his hair is wind-tunnel tested?

Perhaps the most heroic story of the season was Mario Lemieux's. He misses 24 games undergoing radiation treatment for Hodgkin's disease, then comes back, leads the Pens to a 17 game winning streak, a division title and wins the scoring title. If Sports Illustrated gave hockey its due worth they might have honoured Lemieux with their Sportsman of the Year award instead of giving it to some football coach who doesn't know a puck from a cow chip.

Few need to be reminded of the Toronto Blue Jays' championship season, except maybe those of us who were too drunk to remember in the first place. It was just as exciting as '92. The Jays proved themselves to be true champions, winning games that seemed already lost, playing all along as if they were destined to win. That destiny could not have come to pass with more flair than it did when Joe Carter put one out in the bottom of the ninth and Mitch Williams earned his bus ticket out of Philadelphia the hard way. A nice post-script to the story came two months later when The Sporting News honoured Ciro Gaston and Pat Gillick as sportsmen of the year.

Sylvie Frechette also has a stake in the feel-good story of the year. A year after she should have won the gold medal in solo synchronized swimming at the '92 Olympic but got stuck with a silver because a judge screwed up, the IOC rightfully awarded her the gold. Everything comes out roses in this one. Everyone knew Frechette deserved the gold, but she kept quiet and took it in stride. Frechette emerges from the fiasco not only as a gold-medallist but as a class act. The IOC looks good by having the guts to admit their mistake. Kristen Babb-Sprague gets to keep her gold medal. Everyone lives happily ever after.

And then there's the CFL. What can be said about the welfare of a league whose highest profile owner calls his investment his worst business decision since a certain Honus Wagner baseball card. (Hint: his name rhymes with jet-ski.) Well, the Calgary Stampers seemed a shoe-in to make it to the Grey Cup in Calgary. Then they made the minor mistake of losing to Edmonton in the semis, which gave the people in Calgary one less thing to cheer about. At least they have that rodeo thing. In the end, Edmonton won the cup in a route over Winnipeg, which gave the people in Edmonton something to cheer about other than line-dancing.

Scott Goodyear and Paul Tracy drove to success on the Indy-car circuit, proving to our American neighbours that we northerners don't just drive sled dogs.

Causing waves...
